It is folly to say that the big business of the country will suffer. The person who really suffers is the small business man who lives on practically a fixed income. The United States wants money and wants it now. Instead of taxing the widows and orphans on their small inheritances, instead of placing the chief burden of taxation upon the laboring man and the farmer, let us dip into the moneys at the fountainhead, into which the wealth of the country pours annually, as the needs of the country may require.

It is estimated that two-thirds of the wealth of the United States is owned by only 2 per cent of the people. Consequently 98 per cent of the people own only one-third. By fair and logical reasoning it would seem that the 2 per cent should pay 66 per cent of the money cost of the war, and, proportionately, the 98 per cent would pay only 33 per cent of the cost.

We are advised by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that if the English method of taxing profits were applied in the United States it would be the means of raising an additional sum of nearly $3,000,000,000. True, England did not adopt this method until a considerable time after the country was involved in war, but that fact is no argument against its immediate adoption by the United States, because the corporations in this country now reaping billions of dollars in war profits have enjoyed these profits ever since the war began in Europe.

Those who would profit by the misery and suffering of humanity are traitors and not patriots. President Wilson well exemplified the temper of the American people in his Flag Day speech when he said:

Once more we shall make good with our lives and fortunes the great faith to which we were born.

Congress has already pledged the lives of the men of this Nation, but still refuses to conscript the private fortunes pledged by our Chief Executive, or an adequate part of the war profits of our corporations. It is my earnest purpose to support the President in the fulfillment of his pledge of American fortunes to defray the cost of war. To conscript men and at the same time allow monopolistic corporations to fatten upon the world's misery is undemocratic and repugnant to American ideals of liberty and justice. It is a monstrous injustice to ask the survivors of bloody battle fields to come home and pay the money cost of war.

Many Congressmen voted with great reluctance for the bill which will allow these corporations to retain an average of 69 per cent of their excess and abnormal profits that they have made during time of war over and above a legitimate profit.

Let me cite to you some of the profits made by leading industrial corporations for the past five years. The July number of the Review of Reviews vouches for the correctness of the following:

Net income of leading industrial corporations for five years.

[1] Deficit.

Note the great increase in profits for 1916 as compared with 1912. I can see no reason why every cent of these excess profits should not be taken. We are now loaning money to the allies with which they buy our munitions and foodstuffs. Through these loans and purchases our people are indirectly financing the excess profits. If the people have to finance the excess profits indirectly and pay the taxes directly, they are shouldering a double financial burden.

The present war is the most gigantic in all history, as it is the most momentous. In order to bring it to a victorious close, its burdens must be equalized in a manner that will cause all of our citizens to realize that we are to share alike in the adversities of war and the joys of peace—when peace comes. Only by such equal distribution of responsibilities and advantages can the Goliath of concentrated autocracy be slain by the David of universal democracy.

RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolutions were adopted at the Convention of Producers and Consumers, held at St. Paul, Minn., September 19, 20, and 21, 1917, under the auspices of the National Nonpartisan League:

We, your committee on resolutions, report as follows, and move the adoption of the report by the conference:

We are involved in the most gigantic war of all history—a war for democracy and liberty and against autocracy and slavery.

We join the allies in this struggle and to the end that justice, liberty, equality, and democracy, political and industrial, shall be the heritage of all mankind. We pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor to our country and our flag in this our war.

Inspired by patriotic and loyal devotion to the principles of democracy, true to the ideals of our fathers, of upholding and defending human rights and human liberties, and single in our purpose to make the world safe for democracy, political and industrial, we, the members and delegates of farmers' organizations representing 16 States, and the members and delegates of 14 labor organizations representing 11 States, do hereby reaffirm our unalterable loyalty and allegiance to our fellow citizens and our Government in this world struggle and in their every need.

Whereas there exists the fund from which all, or nearly all, of the war expenses can be paid and liquidated while the war is in progress, this fund being the huge surplus created by war profits wrung by extortionate prices from the sweat and suffering of the American people and coined from the blood and the agony of the crucified millions of Europe who are nobly tossing their lives into the cauldron of war in order to preserve human liberties: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That this Nation take the profits of war and the surplus of production as it comes to the surface in the form of swollen dividends and incomes to pay the expenses of war; and be it further

Resolved, That we call upon Congress and the national administration to cause the dollars of America to be enrolled for service just as the youth of this Nation has been compelled and has gladly responded to the call to enroll itself to fight and to die for human liberty, and that when thus enrolled the dollars of America be likewise conscripted, and so much thereof as shall be necessary shall be taken for the uses of war in order that our Government may live and in order that autocracy may die and in order that this may remain in truth and in fact a free, contented, and prosperous land and a Government in very fact and reality of the people, by the people, and for the people; and be it further

Resolved, That as a means of raising war revenue we earnestly urge the conscription of such wealth as it may be found possible to conscript without hampering the operations of industry necessary to the support of the civilian population as well as the maintenance of Army and Navy to the highest efficiency, and as regular war-revenue sources we urge the levy of a 2 per cent tax upon the value of all unused or inadequately used land, whether in city or rural districts, and income taxes levied upon all incomes in excess of $2,000, so that the total net income of any individual shall not exceed $100,000 per annum.

Whereas in response to an earnest appeal for peace by Pope Benedict XV, our Government has made a prompt and courteous reply, which makes clear the purposes of the American people in the war: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That we emphatically indorse as being worthy the support of every good and loyal citizen of our country the reply of our Government to the Pope's peace appeal, and we commend and approve of our Government's efforts to inform the German people that our war is not a war for their injury but for the establishment of that liberty, without which all liberty and democracy is unsafe, and we pledge our support and approval to all further efforts to unite our Government and its allies behind this clear statement of our purposes in order that the war may not continue one day longer than is necessary to attain the noble objects of the American people.

Farmers' Union and Comparative Prices.

SPEECH

OF

HON. THOMAS P. GORE,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, under unanimous consent granted me I insert in the RECORD the following letters:

FARMERS' EDUCATION AND COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION,
Weatherford, Okla., September 24, 1917.

Senator T. P. GORE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The Farmers' Union of this State knows what it is to be maligned, demeaned, and maliciously misrepresented. Because at our State meeting we asked the Government not to fix the price of wheat at less than we were then getting, which was equal to a $3, Chicago, basis, declared for 30-cent cotton, and indorsed your splendid record as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture; because of these things the Daily Oklahoman of this State, in red-ink headlines on the front page, has called us profiteers and traitors.

Their scurrilous editorials, which they thought would act as an anæsthetic, have been a real tonic. Since they appeared I have had more than a hundred letters inquiring about the union, saying they read about us in the Oklahoman, and that they liked our resolutions and wanted to organize in their neighborhood. It seems they place $3 wheat, 30-cent cotton, and Senator GORE on one side and the enemies of Senator GORE on the other side.

The Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union is, as its name implies, an organization for the protection of the farmer through education and cooperation. Through organization we are enabled to keep ourselves posted on the records of public officials. Unorganized we would believe you as black as the purchased press paint you. Organized we know every vote you have cast in 10 years in the Senate has been in the interest of the laboring man and the producer.

Through organization we learn to cooperate and through cooperation gain recognition that as individuals we would never receive. As an organization we were given a place on the "wheat-pricing committee." Our national president was a member. Two other farmers' organizations were given a place on the committee. Through organization the Farmers' Union of this State was allowed a hearing before Mr. Hoover on pricing of "mixed wheat," and a price secured which restricted to some extent the threatened gouging of the Oklahoma farmer. It is conservative to say that the efforts of the Farmers' Union in wheat pricing made the farmers of Oklahoma alone between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000.

An amendment offered to the war-revenue bill provided a war tax of $2.50 per bale on cotton. Through the efforts of the representatives of the Farmers' Union sent to Washington and the thousands of petitions and telegrams sent in by union conventions this provision was killed, and I might add that every cotton State recognized you as their spokesman in the Senate, and many have gratefully so expressed themselves.

I wish every intelligent farmer would get into the union that our organization may have the strength necessary to protect the farmer when this war is over and the time for readjustment comes. Organization is preparedness for that day.

I agree with what you state in your recent letter, that all necessary sacrifices "will be borne with patience if apportioned with justice."

The farmers claim no special privileges or exemptions. They only ask that they shall not be subjected to unequal sacrifices and therefore to unjust sacrifices. They are willing to bear their share of the burdens of peace and war, but they think these burdens ought to be equalized among the various classes of the people, and that those who are least able to bear them should not be subjected to the heaviest burdens and impositions. Let me quote you from memory a few prices on farm implements and machinery and you will be confirmed in your statement that if the farmer is to be compelled to sell in a controlled market he should be allowed to buy in a controlled market, or if he is obliged to buy at war prices he should be allowed to sell at war prices, either one or the other. All we ask is justice and equality. A few years ago wagons could be bought for $65. Now they are $125. Wheat drills bought then for $50 are now $150. Binders were $125, now $200; planters $8, now $16; binding twine 11 cents, now 20 cents; overalls $1.25, now $2.25; gang plows $55, now $110; plows $12, now $20, etc. These great increases in the prices of implements and machinery which the farmers must buy justify an increase in the price which he receives for his products. They reinforce the farmer's contention that if the price of wheat and other farm products are reduced by the Government, then the price of implements and other articles which he must purchase must be correspondingly reduced. In this way only can equality of burden and sacrifice be maintained, and it would also avoid any ground for believing that any discrimination was being practiced against the agricultural classes.

Thanking you again for your labors in behalf of the farmers of Oklahoma and of the country generally, I remain,

Truly, your friend,

JOHN A. SIMPSON.

WASHINGTON, October 1, 1917.

Mr. JOHN A. SIMPSON,
Weatherford, Okla.

MY DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your esteemed favor of recent date, which has been read with interest. I read with particular interest your discussion of the principles and purposes of the Farmers' Union and the comparative prices now prevailing in respect to farm implements and machinery. I have been under a strong conviction that the cost of living and the cost of machinery on the part of the farmer had greatly advanced. Your statistics confirm this conviction. I am also strongly of the conviction that the best interest not only of the farmer but the best interest of the country at large will be protected and promoted by a policy of equal and exact justice as between the farmers and all other classes of our citizenship. I know the patriotism of the farmer well enough to know that he is willing to bear his full share of the burdens inseparable from this war. But no one can answer his argument that these burdens should not be imposed upon him disproportionate to the burdens of others. The war itself is largely a battle of bread and the farmer must hold this line against all comers. He is entitled to the encouragement and support of the Government and all others who are really devoted to the general welfare and to an early consummation of an acceptable and permanent peace.

It is the law of war that you must oppose force with force. It is a law equally well recognized in the business world that you must meet organization with organization. Farming is a business. The farmer is a business man. He can succeed only upon business principles. Every other class of business men is organized. The merchants, manufacturers, bankers, and all other classes maintain an organization to investigate, study, and promote the best ways and means of promoting their mutual interest and their individual and collective success. It is necessary that the farmers should also organize, not for offensive purposes but for defensive purposes, to protect and promote in all legitimate ways their legitimate interests. I hope that you may succeed in inducing the farmers of Oklahoma to enter into such an organization for such purposes even on a more extended scale than at present. I have no doubt that the prosperity of the State collectively and the prosperity of the farmers both collectively and individually will be greatly stimulated and enhanced by such a well-founded and well-directed organization.

Please pardon the length of this letter, and believe me with best wishes,

Truly, your friend,

T. P. GORE.

Revenue Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD E. BROWNE,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, the present session of Congress has passed more important legislation than any other Congress or any other legislative body in the history of the world. The total amount of money appropriated is $21,390,730,940.46, or over 21 thousand millions of dollars. This large expenditure of money can not be comprehended except by comparison. The total value of farm property in the United States, including land, farm buildings, and personal property, according to the last United States census, was less than twice this amount. The appropriation amounts to over six times the total value of all the property, real and personal, within the State of Wisconsin. This enormous sum of money and the larger amounts of money that will have to be appropriated by succeeding Congresses to meet the expenses of the war must be raised by taxation.

TAXATION.

The question of framing an equitable and fair taxation bill is therefore a very important matter and one on which the future prosperity and happiness of the people depends. A war of the magnitude we are engaged in demands universal sacrifice. The entire resources and wealth of the country and, much greater than that, the lives of the hundred million people of the United States have been pledged to the President to bring the war to a successful termination. It is impossible to enact a perfect tax law. We never have had one yet, and never will be able to enact a perfect and equitable tax law.

JUSTICE IN TAXATION.

Justice in taxation does not mean equality in the amount of money paid. It means equality coupled with an equal ability to pay. In times of war there should be equality of sacrifice. It may be a greater sacrifice for a man of small means to be taxed a few dollars, so that he has to forego all luxuries and many necessities, than for a man of wealth to be taxed 95 per cent of his total income. We must not overlook the fact that quite a large part of almost every tax is shifted so that the ultimate consumer in his actual necessities of life pays a large indirect tax.

THE WAR-REVENUE BILL.

The war-revenue bill is supposed to raise $2,534,870,000. The next revenue bill will undoubtedly be larger. The question that I believe will overshadow every other issue in succeeding Congresses during the war and after its termination will be the question of taxation, whether Congress will pass a revenue law which will allow a shifting of the large proportion of the tax to the ultimate consumer or will raise the bulk of the tax from excess profits and income taxes. Also, whether we shall issue bonds, mortgage the future to pay the greater part of the expenses of the war. Already the large moneyed interests of the country that have made excessive profits from the war have begun a campaign, and every Congressman, Democrat or Republican, who raises his voice in favor of making the wealth of the country and those who are making excessive profits from the war pay a large proportion of the costs of the war can be assured of opposition at the next election.

REVENUE BILL.

The present revenue bill met with strong opposition from the wealth of the country, which delayed its passage many months, yet the highest amount of taxation of excess profits was, "tax on amount in excess of 33 per cent of capital at 60 per cent," while in England they assessed all war profits at 80 per cent. If we had levied a tax for the same amount as England we would have raised $3,200,000,000 on this tax alone. Senator JOHNSON, of California, introduced such an amendment to the revenue bill in the Senate, and made the statement that I have quoted regarding the amount of money such a tax would raise. This amendment was voted down. Take, for example, the Du Pont Powder Co.. In 1913 its net earnings were $4,582,075. In 1916 its net earnings were $82,107,693. Taking $6,000,000 as an average prewar profit and deducting same from the amount made per year during the war, and you have over $76,000,000 net war profits. If this amount had been taxed 80 per cent, it would have given the Government over $60,000,000 in taxes, and still the Du Ponts would have had a balance of over $22,000,000 profits, as against $4,500,000 before the war. Twenty-two million dollars a year profits would certainly keep the wolf from scratching very hard at the Du Pont door.

I could name many other corporations that are making excessive profits out of the war, and I place in the RECORD at the close of my remarks a table, which is accurate, of the earnings of many corporations, that should be taxed much higher than they are. The United States Steel Co. is making over $1,000,000 per day net profits over and above depreciation and all overhead charges. I herewith insert a letter written to me from a company of my own State, which manufactures sanitary barn equipment, showing how the Steel Co. has increased prices, and how it affects our dairy farmers:

FORT ATKINSON, WIS., July 9, 1917.

Hon. E. E. BROWNE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR:

* * * * * * *

To give you some idea of the tremendous increases in the cost of our raw materials we might say that tubing, for which we paid $3.80 in 1913, now would cost us $12.94; sheets, at $2.85 in 1913, now $11; malleable, $3.80 then, now $12; bolts, 20⅝ cents then, now 60 cents.

The Steel and Metal Digest for June, 1917, gives the following figures on "composite pig iron" prices:

July 3, 1917	$53.56
June 29, 1917	52.96
June 1, 1917	44.56
June 1, 1916	18.55
June 1, 1915	13.05
June 1, 1914	13.61
June 1, 1913	14.97

The same publication gives "composite steel" prices:

June 29, 1917	$5.70
June 1, 1917	4.58
June 1, 1916	2.83
June 1, 1915	1.53
June 1, 1914	1.47
June 1, 1913	1.77

In connection with these figures, showing the increase in the cost of raw materials, please consider also the published earnings of the United States Steel Corporation:

First quarter, 1917	$113,121,018
(or $452,484,032 for the year.)
The year 1916	333,625,086
The year 1915	130,396,012
The year 1914	71,663,615
The year 1913	137,181,345
The year 1912	108,174,673

We quote the United States Steel Corporation figures because they are the only ones available. Figures of other companies probably show still larger percentage of profit.

When we read of the enormous profits made by the Steel Corporation and other similar concerns, we can not help but think of the hundreds and perhaps thousands of dairy farmers who have not bought, and who will not buy, dairy-barn equipment because of the high price; of our own loss of profit thereby, and the loss to the country because these farmers can not have the advantage of the mechanical means to increase their milk yield, save labor, and save feed.

These enormous profits seem to us far from right, especially at this time, placing as they do such heavy additional burdens on the public for the sake of creating undue profits for the few.

We are writing the above letter thinking that perhaps it may contain information of suggestions that may be of interest to you at this time.

Yours, truly, JAMES MANUFACTURING CO.,
By E. W. SIMONS.

If we levied the same tax, to wit, 80 per cent, on excess profits that England does, we would receive from the United States Steel Co. over $300,000,000 per year and then leave them nearly $100,000,000 profits per year, a sum very much larger than they ever made, and they have always made exorbitant profits.

MOST OF THE PEOPLE ARE MAKING GREAT SACRIFICES ON ACCOUNT OF THE WAR.

The masses of the people are called upon, and will be more and more, to make great sacrifices during the continuation of the war. That sacrifice should be equitably apportioned. The rank and file of the American people who must do the fighting and produce the vast quantities of supplies, which at this time are as necessary as armies, are not making anything out of the war. They are growing poorer every day on account of the runaway prices of the necessities that the average family has to buy.

COMMISSIONER OF LABOR'S REPORT.

The United States Commissioner of Labor made a survey of the city of Washington, filing his report October, 1917, showing that one-third of the families living in the city of Washington faced a deficit for the fiscal year. Washington is more prosperous than the average American city. The average person in this country can not give up much more money than he is giving at the present time. He is already down to the bone. We can not keep adding to the burdens of the already poor without crushing out their lives.

The cost of living in the United States has gone up nearly 100 per cent and wages have not gone up over 28 per cent. The food committee appointed by the District of Columbia says:

Interesting figures were obtained from the proprietors of some of the smaller stores, whose business is with the poorer people. They show clearly that the poor have been compelled to resort to the strictest economy in order to provide food on account of the high prices. Their purchases are of the cheapest possible articles and in smaller quantities than heretofore. The sale of the ordinary cuts of meats in this class of stores seems to have been discontinued and the meat now purchased consists of hog livers, hog kidneys, neck bones, hog faces.

The man with a salary of $600 or $1,000 per year endeavoring to raise a family can not stand a $10 or $20 tax as well as a man with an income of $1,000,000 per year can stand a tax of $990,000. The one means sacrifice and may be want, the other means no sacrifice.

When Senator KENYON stated on the floor of the Senate that no man in these times should be allowed an annual income of over $100,000 per year he was denounced as an anarchist. I cheerfully take a position beside the able Senator from Iowa and would be willing to vote for an amendment to the revenue bill, as a war measure, much more drastic than making the maximum income allowed an individual $100,000 per year.

CONSCRIPT WEALTH.

We have passed a law conscripting the boys of this country. We go into the homes of all alike. The humblest cottage in the land, if the iron fate of chance decrees that one, two, or three or the stalwart sons shall be offered to their country, is not exempt. Many parents would rather give over home, farm, all their worldly effects than have their boy go, yet they bow to the voice of duty and their country. When we conscript boys we go to the people that have strong, healthy, intelligent boys. When we conscript wealth we must go where we can find wealth, to the wealthy, and we certainly should not be more tender about conscripting wealth than we are of conscripting boys, the flesh and blood of the land.

INCOME TAX.

Approximately 377,000 people of this country paid a national income tax in 1915. They represent not to exceed one million and a half of people out of our entire population of 100,000,000 people. Ninety-eight and one-half million people paid no national income tax because they did not have incomes that reached $3,000 per year. Prof. King, of the University of Wisconsin, a reliable statistician, is authority for the statement that 2 per cent of the people of the United States own 65 per cent of this country's total wealth.

SOCIAL UNREST.

To-day there is social unrest in this country. There is no use of shutting our eyes to the situation, but we should study the causes, for I believe that this country has more to fear from the unrest and dissatisfaction caused by social and economic conditions at home than it does from foreign foes.

ENGLAND.

England appointed a committee of inquiry into industrial unrest, and a very thorough survey was made, the committee reporting as follows:

The unrest is really widespread and in some directions extreme. We are at this moment in sight of a possible social upheaval, or at least extensive and manifold strikes. No tinkering will meet the requirements of the situation. It is necessary to secure to the workingman a fair share of the product of his labor and a just participation in the establishment of the conditions of the industry. The workmen consider they should be dealt with as men.

The main causes for the unrest are set out as follows: (1) Food prices; (2) profiteering; (3) industrial fatigue; (4) inequality of sacrifice; (5) uncertainty as to the future; (6) want of confidence in the Government and resentment at undue interference.

It will be noted that one of the reasons assigned for the unrest was that the Government did not check profiteering. President Wilson announced the doctrine early that excess profits and patriotism can not go together in this war. It rests upon Congress to see that this principle is carried out in future revenue bills.

WAR-REVENUE BILL.

The present revenue bill was a compromise. There were many features of it that I did not like and voted to eliminate. I do not favor trying to raise money through the Post Office Department by increasing postage. I am not in favor of raising money by taxing freight or parcel-post packages, because such a tax is always shifted upon the consumer. I voted for the Keating amendment and other amendments which sought to place a higher tax on excessive profits, especially war profits. I do not believe that the principle of conscription of men can be defended unless it is accompanied by the conscription of incomes. If it is right for the Government to ask some men to fight and give their lives for their country, it is certainly right to ask other men to give a large share of their incomes to the Nation's cause. I herewith attach a carefully prepared table showing the enormous profits that certain corporations are making and how their profits have been augmented since the war. There are many other corporations that could be added, but space forbids. The 33 men whose names are given as officers and directors of these corporations are members of the Council of National Defense. The aggregate net profits of these corporations amounted to $900,301,596 in 1916 and will amount to over one thousand million dollars in 1917. I submit that these enormous and unparalleled profits should be taxed very much more than they are now.

Table showing net profits of 33 members of the Council of National Defense and the net income (amount applicable to dividends on stock) of a few of the companies of which these gentlemen are officers or directors.

[NOTE.—These figures are official, being those published in the companies' own annual reports.]

The United States Shipping Board.

OF
HON. JOSHUA W. ALEXANDER, OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following:

THE UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD.

A BRIEF STATEMENT OF ITS WAR-TIME ACTIVITIES.

Legislation having for its purpose the establishment of an agency of the Government to foster and build up the American merchant marine had its genesis shortly after the commencement of the European war, when we found our foreign commerce paralyzed through the withdrawal by England and France of their ships from our service to serve the war needs of themselves and their allies and the destruction or laying up of all the great tonnage of German and Austrian ships. But it was not until after two years had elapsed that the act authorizing the creation of the United States Shipping Board, commonly called the shipping act, was approved September 7, 1916. Briefly stated, the powers conferred upon this new board, which was made independent of any other department of the Government, being similar in this respect to the Interstate Commerce Commission, are of two kinds. First, those intended to enable it to increase American shipping engaged in foreign commerce; and, second, those having to do with the regulation of common carriers by water. Of the first, probably the most important was the power given the board to acquire, through construction, purchase, lease, or charter, ships suitable for over-seas commerce and for use as naval auxiliaries in time of war. For this purpose $50,000,000 was made available as a revolving fund.

The organization of the Shipping Board was at last effected February 1, 1917. Only a brief survey of the general shipping situation of the world was required to convince the board that the best service it could render the Nation would be to increase the production of merchant ships. The destruction of commercial shipping from the commencement of the European war up to January 1, 1917, had, according to the statement made by Lord Beresford before the British Parliament on this subject, reached the great total of more than 4,000,000 tons gross, while the building of merchant ships in England and Germany, the two greatest shipbuilding nations theretofore, had been practically abandoned because of the war. It was left, therefore, to this country to play the largest rôle in making good the rapid depletion of the world's commercial shipping. Plans were immediately laid by the board for the construction of as many vessels as the fund available for that purpose would provide.

The alarming increase of losses by submarines which followed the declaration by Germany of her policy of sinking every vessel, regardless of nationality, which might enter the zones proscribed by her, resulted in the destruction during the period from February 1 to May 1, 1917, of about 2,200,000 tons more of shipping. It immediately became apparent to all those who were studying the situation that the production of merchant ships in this country would have to be increased to the very greatest possible maximum if we were not to witness the triumph of Germany's ruthless disregard of all considerations of right and humanity, with the consequent defeat of ourselves and the nations associated with us in the war.

With this situation before it, the Shipping Board early in May went before the Senate Committee on Appropriations and submitted information and arguments which led to the inclusion in the urgent deficiency appropriation act of June 15, 1917, of the following items:

Purpose.	Authorization.	Appropriation.
For purchasing, requisitioning, or otherwise acquiring ships, materials, plants, and charters on ships	$250,000,000	$150,000,000
For the construction of ships	500,000,000	250,000,000
For the operation of ships	5,000,000	5,000,000
Total	755,000,000	405,000,000

REQUISITIONING OF VESSELS UNDER CONSTRUCTION.

This act gave the President power to commandeer all the shipbuilding facilities of the Nation if in his judgment such action should become expedient, and authorized him to exercise the powers conferred upon him through such agency of the Government as he might choose. Acting under the authority of this legislation, the President on the 11th day of July issued an Executive order delegating to the Emergency Fleet Corporation—the corporation organized by the Shipping Board to carry out its shipbuilding program—the power to requisition vessels in course of construction and the materials necessary therefor. Pursuant to this order, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, on August 3, 1917, requisitioned all vessels of 2,500 tons dead-weight carrying capacity and over which were under construction in the shipyards of the United States on that date. By this act a total of more than 400 vessels in varying stages of completion were taken over, of a total dead-weight tonnage of more than 2,800,000.

One of the principal purposes of this move was to enable the Government to speed up the construction of these ships by using its power to require preference in the furnishing of materials, by the elimination of nonessential refinements of construction and equipment, by the addition of overtime work where necessary, and modifications in construction to make the ships more suitable for effective service during the war. It is estimated that the expenditure necessary to complete these vessels and to reimburse their former owners for the property rights which they were deprived of by the requisition will amount to a total sum of $515,000,000. Two hundred and fifty million dollars was authorized for this purpose by the act of June 15, 1917, and the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved October 6, 1917, authorized the remaining $265,000,000.

NEW SHIP CONSTRUCTION.

The funds at the disposal of the Shipping Board at the present time for the purpose of securing the construction of new ships amounts to a total of $1,284,000,000, made up as follows: Fifty million dollars made available by the shipping act; $250,000,000 authorized and appropriated by the act of June 15, 1917; $250,000,000 authorized but not appropriated by the latter act; $250,000,000 authorized and appropriated by the act of October 6, 1917; and $484,000,000 authorized but not appropriated by the last-named act. Up to September 22, 1917, the Shipping Board and its Emergency Fleet Corporation had let contracts for the construction of 636 ships of approximately 3,124,700 tons dead-weight capacity. The following table shows the division of the above total among the different types of construction:

Wood	353	1,253,900
Steel	225	1,663,800
Composite	58	207,000
Total	636	3,124,700

It is estimated that the additional $734,000,000 made available by the deficiency act just approved, October 6, 1917, will make possible the construction of approximately 5,000,000 tons dead-weight in addition to those now under construction and those for which contracts have been let.

The following table is a summary of the complete shipbuilding program of the board:

Program.	Number.	Dead-weight tonnage.
Ships under construction which were requisitioned by order of Aug. 3, 1917	403	2,800,000
Ships for which contracts had been let Sept. 22, 1917, under program for new ship construction	636	3,124,700
Program contemplated under additional authorizations of act of Oct. 6, 1917	600	5,000,000
Total	1,639	10,924,700

All of the vessels represented in the above program will be suitable for over-seas commerce. As a basis for comparison it may be stated that at the commencement of the present world war the United States had less than 1,600,000 tons deadweight of ships registered for foreign trade, and has at the present time about 3,571,000 tons deadweight registered therefor. In order to indicate the unprecedented expansion of our shipbuilding activities it may be stated that according to the report of Commissioner of Navigation for 1916, the total tonnage of vessels built in the United States and documented during the fiscal year 1914 was only 316,250 tons gross; during the year 1915, 225,122; and during the year which ended June 30, 1916, only 325,413 tons gross. By comparing these figures with the approximately 4,000,000 tons gross which is now actually under construction or about to be commenced one can gain some idea of the enormous increase in merchant shipbuilding which has taken place during the last 18 months in this country.

SEIZURE AND REPAIR OF GERMAN SHIPS.

Its shipbuilding program, though the board's greatest enterprise, is not its only one. The President, by an Executive order dated June 30, 1917, directed the Shipping Board to take over to the United States the possession and title of all the German ships lying in ports under the jurisdiction of the United States, repair them and place them in service. Acting under this authority the board took possession of 88 vessels of approximately 660,000 tons gross measurement. All of them had been lying idle in our ports since soon after Germany's declaration of war against France. When it became apparent that this country would recognize the state of war which Germany had forced upon us the German officers and crews aboard these ships started in to damage them as extensively as possible, so that in the event our Government should seize them they would be in such condition that their immediate use would be impossible. They went so far in one instance as to sink the ship. The inspection of the others by the board's surveyors disclosed the fact that very elaborate and ingenious schemes of destruction had been practiced, aimed not only at temporarily disabling the vessel but also at making their repair as difficult and slow as possible. One of the most commonly practiced forms of destruction was that of smashing one or more of the engine cylinders. These cylinders, especially the low-pressure ones, are castings of immense size, and the German officers knew that the facilities in this country for reproducing or repairing them were necessarily very limited.

Notwithstanding the many difficulties encountered, all of these ships, with the exception of a small number which were at ports in our island possessions and had to be brought to this country before work on them could be begun, have been repaired by the board and put into service. Thirty-two have been turned over to the Navy and are being used as transports. For the sake of accuracy it should be stated that the repair of these transport vessels, though commenced by the Shipping Board, was taken over by the Navy Department when they were transferred to it by the President and completed by it. Eight are now in the service of the Army, 17 have been chartered to allied Governments to serve their war needs, and the remainder are engaged in serving our national interests in a commercial way. The expeditious repair and getting into service of these vessels has been of inestimable value in the carrying of troops, munitions, and supplies to France, Italy, and Russia.

PURCHASE OF AUSTRIAN SHIPS.

Eight of the Austrian ships which had been lying idle in our ports since the beginning of the European war have been purchased by the board, repaired, and put into service, thus adding another 57,500 tons gross to our merchant marine. All of these vessels are being used to serve war needs.

REQUISITION OF COMPLETED VESSELS.

The Shipping Board, through a mutual arrangement with the War Department, is requisitioning all the vessels needed for military purposes. Using its wide and accurate knowledge of the whole shipping situation and the type and character of all American vessels, it is striving to take just the vessels which will best meet the needs of the War Department and at the same time manage the withdrawals so as to cause as little dislocation and disorganization of commercial shipping facilities as possible.

The board has announced that every American merchant vessel of 2,500 tons dead-weight capacity and larger, available for ocean service, will be requisitioned October 15. Most of these ships, with the exception of those required for actual Government service, will be chartered back to their owners to be operated under the direction of the Shipping Board. The principal reasons for this action are, briefly stated: First, to avoid the discrimination and injustice which would necessarily arise from depriving some of the owners of their vessels and leaving the owners whose vessels had not been taken to reap still greater returns by boosting freight rates still higher; second, to enable the Government to direct the use of the ships affected so that they will best serve the interests of the Nation in general; third, to check the constant rise in freight and charter rates, which go higher and higher as more vessels are taken for military purposes. The rates at which these ships will be chartered back to their former owners have been fixed. They are graded up and down from a basic rate of $5.75 per ton dead-weight capacity, according to the size and speed of the vessel and the form of charter party used, whether bare ship or time.

REMOVAL OF GREAT LAKES VESSELS.

A plan is now in process of execution by the Shipping Board which contemplates the removal from the Great Lakes before the close of navigation this fall of all the vessels suitable for ocean service. Those too large to go through the canal locks will be cut in two and put together again when they reach the seaboard. In this way a large tonnage of ships which would otherwise be laid up in idleness throughout the winter months, when navigation on the Lakes is closed, will be made available for use in the coastwise trade, in turn releasing an equivalent tonnage of vessels now engaged in that trade which are suitable for over-seas service.

ESTABLISHMENT OF NAUTICAL SCHOOLS.

As soon as it launched its shipbuilding program, the board realized that if the vessels which would thereby be added to our merchant marine were to become in all respects American that American officers and crews would have to be provided for them. The available supply of ships' officers in this country was practically exhausted. To meet this need nautical schools were established at various points on our coasts, and thousands of American boys and young men are being trained to officer the great fleet in process of construction.

It is interesting to note how the Shipping Board, which was created when our country was at peace and was intended to serve peaceful ends, has been almost completely diverted from the pursuit of the functions for which it was established into the prosecution of projects vitally important to the successful prosecution of the war. It had been organized but a few months previously and had but a very small and newly associated personnel when the huge task of increasing the production of merchant ships so as to replace the enormous tonnage destroyed by submarines and mines devolved upon it. This task completely overshadows its peace-time functions and has converted it into one of the Government's greatest agencies for the prosecution of the war. As an indication of the enormity of the undertaking before it a statement of the funds which Congress has made available for its work may be of value.

The following table is designed to show the amounts of money authorized and the amounts appropriated for the work of the board by different acts of Congress:

Summary of authorizations and appropriations.

[1] The $50,000,000 made available by the shipping act was for the purposes of construction, purchase, lease, and charter of ships, and if used for subscribing to stock in a corporation, for the additional purpose of operation of ships. But the present intent is to use this fund for new ship construction.

[2] This fund, totaling $515,000,000, is being used to compensate owners whose ships were requisitioned in course of construction under the order of Aug. 3, 1917, and for completing the ships thus taken over.

The Cost of Living.

OF

HON. EDWARD C. LITTLE,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, during the last six months greater responsibilities have been devolved upon this House of Representatives than ever before came to any legislative body in the history of the world. The House has met those responsibilities with a unanimity that is not paralleled in the records of the parliaments of the world. Party spirit has been forgotten by the minority and every effort made to aid the majority. Every bill that has been presented here to secure the sinews of war has practically been passed unanimously. In the last six months this House has accomplished greater legislative results than were ever before brought about by any parliamentary body in any three years in the annals of mankind. All this has been done by men who did their duty without any playing to the grand stand, without any superficial boast of patriotism superior to their fellows, without any vociferous appeal to prejudice or passion. There has been no sounding of brass, no tinkling of cymbals among those who are most responsible for the work that has been completed here.

That having reached such tremendous results in so short a time the House should have occasionally overlooked and sometimes made mistakes is quite natural. The Constitution of the United States gives to this Congress authority to issue the edicts and the mandates of a hundred million people, and this Congress alone will be held responsible in history for what is done by the American people in enacting their laws in the turmoil and confusion of this epoch. We have levied the taxes, appropriated the moneys to carry on the war and to enable those fighting our common enemy to keep their armies in the field with a lavish generosity that the world never dreamed of before. This House has voted to the administrative officers upon whom is placed the duty of executing the will of the American people greater powers than are lodged elsewhere in the world in any body of men. There still remains one task uncompleted. You have placed in the hands of the administration the authority, as you intended, to control the high cost of living, that is the greatest tax that falls upon our people, and the one from which the poor man can make no escape. That result has not yet been attained. The first duty of this House is to the people of America. When you return in December the bitter winds of winter will be the only outdoor music anywhere in the United States. This House intended to make provision for the emergencies that are bound to come, and to do it so definitely that nobody's oversight, that no necessity of carrying other great burdens, should prevent the American citizen from being able to support his family this winter on whatever salary he may receive, on whatever income he may have.

I present a table of figures that may now seem dry and uninteresting, but I think by Christmas everybody in Congress and in the administration will find them amply interesting to hold attention.

These figures are taken from the Topeka State Journal of September 26, 1917. The State Journal says that pork tenderloins have doubled in price in the last six months, that the soup bone has aviated to 5 cents a pound, and baked ham is retailed for 70 cents a pound. The State Journal then gives a comparison of the Topeka retail prices of March 27 last in the first column and of September 26 in the second column, the first being taken from the advertisements in the paper of that date and each figure being the price per pound of the given commodity on March 27 in the first column and on September 26 in the second column:

Commodity.	Price per pound Mar. 27, 1917.	Price per pound Sept. 26, 1917.
	Cents.	Cents.
Link Sausage	16	22, 25, 35
Bulk sausage	16, 17	22
Porterhouse steak	22½	35
Sirloin steak	20	35
Round steak	20	30
Chuck steak	17, 18, 20	25
Pork chops steak	25	38
Wienerwursts	.....	28
Bacon	25, 35	35, 45
Pork tenderloin	25	50
Pork roast	23	35
Pork ribs	17	.....
Beef roast	15	25
Soup meats	7, 8	10, 15
Lamb chops	.....	45
Mutton chops	.....	40
Leg of lamb	.....	40
Fish	18, 20	20, $1.25
Baked ham	.....	70

There are 13 of these commodities, of which figures are given of both dates. If you take 1 pound of each of these at the minimum prices at each date, the 13 pounds cost on March 27, $2.49½, and on September 26, $3.82, a gain of 34 per cent. If you buy 1 pound of each commodity at each date at the maximum price, the 13 pounds would cost, in March, $2.66½, and in September, $5.15, an advance of 48 per cent. A careful comparison would indicate that at Topeka, Kans., in the six months since this Congress assembled, the cost of living upon meats has increased 40 per cent. This Congress and this administration have pledged the American people to reduce the high cost of living. We all realize that the future of the world depends upon the ability of the United States to become a deciding factor in the great world conflict. This can not be accomplished unless the American people have enough to eat, and the American people can not have enough to eat unless their incomes will purchase their food. I am no believer in the theory that it would be a wise thing to automatically decrease the demand for food by making the prices so high as to prevent people from buying it. That, in my judgment, is not good philosophy and is not good statecraft. Furthermore, in my opinion, it is not necessary.

The only thing that has been done so far, practically, is to reduce the price of wheat at the farm so that the farmer, who is holding his wheat, as he had a right to, expecting to share in the general rise of prices, has lost money. This has been done without putting cheaper bread on the table of the people, so that neither element is benefited. If the farmer gets less for his wheat, the miller should get less for his flour and the baker should get less for his bread and the people should receive cheaper bread. I have received the following from the Ridges Grange, of Bronson, Kans., to which I invite your attention:

The Ridges Grange, No. 1616, wishes to protest against the fixing of the price of wheat by the Government when they allow the millers to set their own price on flour and the makers of farm implements to place such price on their products.

GEORGE C. CAMPBELL, Secretary.

The farmer does not insist on high prices for his wheat. All he asks is that he be treated like everybody else. The baker who sells the bread is the man with whom the consumer deals. What good does it do the American people to cut the price of wheat if they must pay just as much for bread? If the agricultural implements with which he produces this wheat are sold to the farmer at these exceptional and remarkable war-time prices, how can he afford to utilize them in raising these crops unless he shares in this general distribution of increase in price? You permit his income to be assailed by these high prices. Why pick him out for reduction of income? When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] introduced his amendment to control the price of cotton, I doubted the advisability of it, because I felt that no particular farm product should be singled out from the rest, and yet now I see the friends of cotton, in control of the Government, do not hesitate a moment about their treatment of wheat. In my judgment the farmers have no objection to the application of this rule of reduction of wheat if the things they purchase and the things the consumer uses are accorded the same treatment. Anybody can advise people to quit eating. The duty of a statesman is to place what they must eat within reach of their incomes.

Yesterday turnips sold in the Washington market for 2 cents apiece. If you go into the restaurant downstairs you will pay 12½ cents for an ear of corn. Down at the Willard an ear of corn will cost you 17½ cents.

The year before I entered the State university I taught a country school and boarded with Tom Perry. Corn was 5 cents a bushel, and we burned bushels of it in the kitchen stove. Mr. Perry had a house of one room and a family of five, besides myself and the hired man. Some of us slept in the little lean-to unplastered and unlathed, and sometimes I have stuffed a shirt in a knot hole when the snow beat in, as it did occasionally. But Tom had 300 hogs and we had good meat all winter. His garden had been a prosperous one and he enjoyed the plenty of a peach orchard. He charged me just exactly $2 a week for board and lodging, and I got as good meals as I am receiving now at the George Washington Inn. Where is anybody who can live on $2 a week now? A man has to perch on the moon to get high enough to examine the bill of fare at a first-class hotel. How do you think these people are going to live this winter who have big families and small wages, if you do not regulate the price of what they eat? What is the use of telling these people to cut their meals in two when some of them hardly get enough to eat now? Our fathers crossed the ocean 300 years ago so that their children could enjoy every opportunity that nature affords as a reward for the industry of man. Is the administration of this food-control bill as it has started going to accomplish that result? I am well aware that there must be trial trips of the plans of the department this Congress has created to carry out the terms of this legislation, and I am waiting patiently for their efforts to culminate in a definite and useful application of the legislation Congress has provided. Congress enacted this statute with the anticipation that its terms would be so enforced as to reduce the high cost of living, and we shall expect that effect to result before we return in December. We are well aware that this great world conflict taxes the intellects of the world's greatest men, but the most useful statesman our country can command has no grander opportunity, no loftier demand upon his talents, than the carrying of the working people of this country through this winter without suffering, a mission upon which we wish our statesmen Godspeed. There is no part of the duties that fall upon the world's leaders now more essential to a final decree in favor of humanity than that the civilization our fathers founded for us here in this great Republic shall maintain itself soundly and safely and beneficially to its people that it may be the bulwark of the world, the beacon light of civilization, the ultimate and final factor in the successful termination of this mighty conflict into which we have entered. We can not help others unless we are able to take care of ourselves, and common sense suggests that assiduous and careful attention be given to the cost of living that our people may see established a straight line from the farmer's field to the consumers' table, a matter of mutual interest to both.

Exemption of Farm Labor and Price of Wheat.

OF
HON. JOUETT SHOUSE,
OF KANSAS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I desire to append certain correspondence recently had with the President of the United States upon the question of the exemption of farm labor.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., August 25, 1917.

Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It was source of regret to me and to them that you were unable to see the Kansas committee who were here this week, but I fully understood the circumstances which prevented an appointment with them. They had some interesting facts to present concerning the labor situation in Kansas. I hope you may talk over with Mr. Hoover the conditions they outlined to him.

The exemption boards in Kansas, both local and district, seem to feel it is contrary to the instructions of the Provost Marshal General, and hence contrary to their duty under those instructions, to relieve from the operation of the draft men actually engaged in farming and live-stock raising. No doubt the same condition applies in other sections of the country. The result is that in our State, so largely dependent upon agricultural pursuits, the labor situation on the farms is becoming serious in the extreme. Unless there is some relief, production will inevitably suffer.

Our young farmers are patriotic. They are willing to serve their country. Many of them feel it a disgrace to ask for exemption and will not do so. I have no sympathy in the world with the slacker who has sought or who may seek to escape the draft through a sudden attempt to transform himself into a farmer. But I feel very earnestly that the actual, bona fide, skilled farmer, in almost every instance, can render a greater service just now by remaining at hard work on the farm than by going into the Army.

Therefore, I urged upon the committee from Kansas that they suggest to Mr. Hoover the following plan, and I am taking the liberty of submitting it to you: That a proclamation be issued by you personally, or by you through the Provost Marshal General, exempting from the operation of the draft all men now actually engaged in farming who were so engaged on the 1st of March last. The date thus specified was more than a month before the declaration of war, more than two and a half months before the selective draft bill became a law. Those who were engaged in farming then were real farmers. Unless they have subsequently changed their avocations they are still real farmers. Their places in the Army can be taken by others without injury to the Army; their places on the farm can not be filled by unskilled and inexperienced labor without real loss in production at a time when we can ill afford such loss.

The farmers of the country to-day are in competition with the munitions makers, the steel manufacturers, and other large employers for the labor necessary to produce and harvest their crops. Judge TOWNER, of Iowa, told me last night that in his State a wage of $5 per day is being offered for corn cutters, and even at such a cost it is difficult to procure hands. Unless the young men who have been and who are actual farmers shall be allowed to continue to pursue their accustomed avocations, the volume of our farm products must inevitably decrease. And unless exemption is provided by definite proclamation to apply generally, and thus remove the implication of disgrace in claiming exemption, a serious menace to American agriculture can not be averted.

As you know, I believe thoroughly in the selective-draft law. I believe every citizen owes the definite obligation of service to his Government. I would simply urge that provision be made that each may serve where he can be of greatest value, and that such provision be so definite that it shall not depend upon the judgment of a local board or be subject to varied interpretation in different sections of the country. Each State must fill its quota in the National Army. But men should be sent who can best be spared, not those vitally needed at home. May I, therefore, be permitted to impress upon you very earnestly the suggestion contained in this letter?

With genuine esteem and respect, believe me,
Sincerely, yours,
JOUETT SHOUSE.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 27, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. SHOUSE: I have your letter of August 25 and realize the very grave importance of the matter you broach. I can not see my way, however, to making so wide and sweeping a class exemption as you suggest. The matter of leaving the farmers on the farms has been given the most careful and sympathetic attention by the War Department, and I have before me a letter from the Secretary of War from which I quote the following:

"Gen. Crowder had foreseen the practical need of enabling men in agricultural work to remain at their tasks until the close of the harvest season, and has ingeniously arranged the details of calling to the colors so that the men on the farms will practically all fall within the last group and will, therefore, not have to report for military service until on or about October 1."

I feel that a class exemption would lead to many difficulties and to many heartburnings, much as I should personally like to see all the genuine farmers left at their indispensable labors.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,
WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. JOUETT SHOUSE,
House of Representatives.

UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, August 30, 1917.

Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: After your letter of August 27 I hesitate to again address you on the subject of exemption from the draft of those actually and practically engaged in farming and the production of live stock. I have the greatest respect for your judgment and your conclusions, but I feel it my duty to call your attention to one most important point: You quote from a letter of the Secretary of War, who expresses himself as highly pleased at the arrangements made to enable the harvesting of the fall crop, and who feels that what he designates the "ingenious conception" of Gen. Crowder in postponing until October 1 the calling of farmers to the colors will answer all purposes.

Using Kansas, the foremost of winter-wheat States, as an example, I have seen wheat planted as late as Thanksgiving Day make a good crop. Much—yes; very much—of the Kansas wheat crop is planted in October. And the planting is only the beginning. How is the wheat to be harvested and thrashed if our farm labor is taken from us? How are spring crops to be put out? How is live stock to be carried through the winter?

In all respect, may I be permitted to suggest that if agricultural and live-stock production are in reality as important as the Government insists—and I believe they are—should not the question of exemption of men actually engaged in those pursuits, men who have been engaged in them not merely since the draft law was passed, but for months before—should not this question be viewed from a practical agricultural standpoint rather than merely a military standpoint?

We must raise a big army; true. I am strongly in favor of it. Also, we must increase production of crops and live stock; I am strongly in favor of that. So is every other man who believes in this war and who would help our allies. Don't let us make the fatal mistake of sacrificing all possibilities of increased production by taking into the army those who can best serve on the farm when there are so many hundreds of thousands who would be useful in the army, yet useless on the farm, and who could better serve their country and themselves if called upon for military duty.

If I seem insistent, forgive me. My heart is so intensely in this war and in the cause of humanity which we seek to uphold, that I feel very deeply the conviction which I would try to impress upon you.

With great respect, I am,
Faithfully, yours,
JOUETT SHOUSE.

The appended letter to the Secretary of War, together with his answer to same, will be of interest in the same connection.

WASHINGTON, August 31, 1917.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am inclosing herewith copy of a telegram which I have received this morning from Mr. W. A. Miller, president of the Citizens' National Bank of Anthony, Kans., one of the most prominent and sensible country bankers in our State. You will please note the condition to which Mr. Miller calls attention in reference to the farm labor needed for seeding wheat for next year's crop.

In a recent letter in reply to a communication from me concerning the labor situation in Kansas, the President quoted a paragraph from a letter from you in which you made the following statement:

"Gen. Crowder has foreseen the practical need of enabling men in agricultural work to remain at their tasks until the close of the harvest season and has ingeniously arranged the details of calling to the colors so that the men on the farms will practically all fall within the last group and will therefore not have to report for military service until on or about October 1."

Let me direct attention to one most important fact: For some years past there has been a very considerable loss in Kansas wheat from the Hessian fly. The experts of the Department of Agriculture have urged the farmers not to plant wheat until after the 1st of October, so as to avoid the fly, and this plan has been followed in our State for the past two or three years. It must be followed again this year unless the farmers are willing to run the risk of a big loss through the Hessian fly and unless they go absolutely contrary to the methods which the Department of Agriculture has by diligent effort endeavored to have them employ.

You will therefore see that those who are actually engaged in farm work who are made subject to the draft will not be able to assist in the fall seeding unless some provision shall be made whereby they can go to the training camps after that seeding is completed. Personally during my residence in Kansas the past five and a half years I have seen quite a good deal of wheat planted as late as Thanksgiving Day, which made a first-class crop.

May I therefore be permitted to urge that you consider very seriously the advisability of endeavoring to arrange that the men on the farms whose services are required in the fall seeding be given the opportunity to remain at work until approximately the 1st of November before being called to the cantonments? It seems to me that such an arrangement will not interfere with the operation of the draft and that it will be of tremendous value from an agricultural standpoint.

With great respect, I have the honor to be,

Sincerely, yours, JOUETT SHOUSE.

ANTHONY, KANS., August 30, 1917.

JOUETT SHOUSE,
Washington, D. C.:

Sixty per cent of drafted men in this county go from the farms. Date of call, September 19, is right at start of wheat seeding. If farm boys could be called late in October it would help in seeding this coming crop. Labor very scarce. Impossible to employ men for that kind of work.

W. A. MILLER.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 8, 1917.

Hon. JOUETT SHOUSE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SHOUSE: I have your letter of August 31, calling my attention to the necessity of deferring the military service of certain farmers in Kansas until after the crop of winter wheat is sown.

There is authority in the Regulations for District Boards to discharge farmers on the ground of their relation to agriculture, or to give them temporary discharges on that ground. An exercise of this authority by the district board would accomplish the result you seek. To avoid a great deal of administrative effort, it was pointed out in the ruling of Gen. Crowder, to which you refer, that there could be some deferment of men engaged in gathering crops without the necessity of granting temporary discharges. You will see, therefore, that there is no lack of provision of method to cover the very case you mention.

To execute this authority it is necessary to have an administrative tribunal to determine the fact of necessity in each individual case. We have provided this tribunal by creating a district board in each Federal judicial district. It is the duty of this district board to make a survey of the necessities of industries, including agriculture, within the district, and then to attempt to adjust the military needs of the Nation to the industrial needs of the Nation in such a way as to make the burden bear as lightly as possible on industry, including agriculture, and at the same time to furnish an army. It is self-evident that the draft must to some extent interfere with all industry, since to withdraw from the labor supply of the Nation something over a million men is bound to create some interference. In an agricultural community this interference will be felt by agriculture. The extent to which it will be felt is to be determined by the district board, and upon this determination the decision in individual cases must to some extent rest. The district board in Kansas has no doubt made this survey. Using their just judgment and discretion, they have addressed themselves to individual cases. I have no doubt that in refusing discharges in some cases they have interfered to some extent with agriculture, but I equally have no doubt that this interference was necessary. No one could consistently urge that we should make a blanket exemption of persons engaged in agriculture. To do so would simply double, treble, or quadruple the tax on the labor supply of other industries. We must adjust, but we can not protect absolutely. I venture to say, however, that the tax is not creating a general situation of very great hardship. Figured out in mathematical terms, it results in the taking of perhaps 1 man out of 38 men engaged in agriculture. Often that one man is able to present his case of individual hardship in such a way that the conclusion may be drawn on superficial examination that the same condition exists in general and that agriculture is so affected in general. I can not believe that this conclusion should be drawn.

No authority can sit in Washington and, on ex parte statements, make the kind of informed and deliberative decision that a district board sitting in the very community over which it has jurisdiction can make. My correspondence shows a disposition in some agricultural communities to urge upon me a blanket ruling that everyone engaged in agriculture should be exempted from the first draft. I have given the whole problem long and earnest consideration. I know that this can not be done. As we obtain experience we shall be able to apply the draft with a decreasing minimum of general hardship, but we can never apply it with absolutely noninterference with any particular industry. Neither can we group any great number of industries and say that they shall be preferred above other industries in the matter of labor supply. It is true that the food production must be fostered, encouraged, and inflated, but the very conditions of the problem make it self-evident and beyond question that the labor supply with which this inflation is to be accomplished must necessarily be slightly decreased if we are to enter this war in a military capacity. All of us must make the greatest effort and, with the greatest forbearance, work to accomplish the greatest result. We must remember that we can not avoid sacrifices.

Very truly, yours, NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

When the price of wheat was under consideration by the price-fixing committee appointed by the Food Administrator, under authority from the President, and when it looked as if an agreement on price might not be had and that the matter might be referred to the President for final determination, I addressed to him the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, August 23, 1917.

Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: For more than a week I have wanted to write to you about a matter of real importance, but I have hesitated to do so, both in the knowledge of the tremendous number of problems which you are called upon daily to face and in the belief that perhaps you may not care to assume any personal connection with the work of the board now convened in an attempt to fix a fair price for the 1917 crop of wheat. What progress that board is making I do not know. I assume, however, that there is a possibility of so wide a divergence of opinion that unanimous agreement can not be reached. In such circumstance it may become necessary for you to deal personally with the situation, and in any event it is proper that you should have a full knowledge of the farmer's point of view.

At the outset let me emphasize that I am in thorough accord with the objects of the food-administration act. Those objects, as I understand them, are two fold: First, to do away with speculation and exorbitant profits by middlemen, thus making the margin between producer and consumer as small as possible; second, to give the Government authority, if need should arise, to take over any product necessary to the success of the war either for Government use or for distribution among the people at a reasonable price. Very distinctly it was not proposed by this legislation to discriminate either for or against any one class, nor was it intended to levy a special tax upon any one class.

The congressional district which I represent is normally the largest wheat-producing district in the United States. In 1914 it harvested approximately 80,000,000 bushels. This year it has no wheat throughout a large portion of its area and little more than enough for seeding anywhere. Individually I planted 800 acres to wheat last fall, but I harvested not a single spear. And what applies to me applies also to 90 per cent of the farmers of the western half of Kansas. Therefore, what I am about to say is not biased by either personal or political consideration.

All of us realize that the 1917 crop of wheat in the United States is far below normal. This, together with inability to transport wheat from Australia and India, which under normal conditions would be available for consumption in Europe, has caused eager demand for the present crop, even at a very high price. Before the food-administration act was passed the farmers who had wheat to sell were receiving $2.75 and $2.80 per bushel. Many of them believed that their wheat was worth more money, and stored it to hold for an advance. They felt, and naturally, that they were entitled to an advance in the value of their merchandise on account of the limited supply and the unusual demand, just as the cotton growers, the steel manufacturers, and men engaged in every other class of industrial pursuit have increased the price of their products very materially as compared with the prices that prevailed before the war. The fact that wheat is a principal food product does not enter into the farmer's calculations. He sees his fellow farmers of the South sell cotton at unheard of figures without governmental interference or regulation, and if a price is fixed on wheat materially reducing it from what it would command on the open market, the wheat farmer inevitably will feel that the Government has discriminated against him and in favor of the cotton farmer. I do not say that his view represents a correct analysis of the situation, but I know it is a natural analysis.

Of course all of us realize that the cost of production throughout the country has increased tremendously during the last few years. The increase along agricultural lines has been commensurate with the increase along industrial lines. As much as $1.50 per bushel was paid for a considerable part of the 1914 wheat crop, about $1.25 per bushel for some of the 1915 crop, from $1.75 to $2 per bushel for the portion of the 1916 crop that was held until the latter part of the winter, while $2.75 and $3 per bushel was freely offered for the 1917 crop before the passage of the food-control bill. According to the figures of the Department of Agriculture approximately 890,000,000 bushels of wheat were raised in this country in 1914, over a billion bushels in 1915, 640,000,000 bushels in 1916, with an estimate of about 650,000,000 bushels for this year. None of the preceeding crops has approached in cost that of 1917, and yet for those crops many farmers received prices far higher than they had ever received before.

As to the cost of the present crop figures differ. Conservative estimates for the Kansas crop, however, run from $2.40 to $2.60 a bushel. Secretary Mohler, of the State Board of Agriculture, after a careful and painstaking survey of the State, has fixed the figure at $2.65 per bushel. In North Dakota, I believe, a much higher claim of cost is being made. It is not unreasonable that the farmers should expect some margin of profit over and above the cost price. The Kansas farmer believes that the value of his wheat, based on supply and demand under unrestricted trading conditions, is about $3 a bushel. He was securing $2.80 a bushel from the thrasher, and experience has shown him that the price at thrashing time is almost invariably the lowest price of the year. If the Government should name a price substantially lower than $3, the farmer will feel that in effect a special tax is being levied on him for the benefit of other interests which have the privilege of an open market. He will immediately contrast his own condition with that of the cotton grower of the South, who is being permitted to sell his product without restriction and without governmental interference as to price. He will charge political favoritism. He will hold that while his own product is necessary to feed the world, the product of the cotton farmer is equally necessary to clothe the world and to enable the manufacture of the munitions of war without which our enemies can not be defeated.

From each of several standpoints the result will be disastrous if a price is fixed which the farmer regards as unfair and in a sense confiscatory. He will refuse to sell; already there has been an alarming tendency to store. A situation might easily be brought about where you would be compelled to requisition wheat from individual farmers in order to furnish the country with bread and to furnish our allies with their requirements. Nothing more unfortunate could arise. The enmity of the farmers would be aroused at a time when we need their cooperation. They would become suspicious of the attitude of the Government toward them. They would harbor the belief that the price of $2 per bushel already promised them for next year's crop might be seriously reduced. At the very time of seeding, when every effort has been made to induce a largely increased acreage, disappointment and discouragement would become so widespread as to seriously curtail production. I believe, Mr. President, that I have a fairly good idea of the farmer and of his processes of thought, and I am certain the statements I make are not overdrawn.

The Government has promised by legislative enactment a minimum price of $2 per bushel for the 1918 wheat crop. The Department of Agriculture here at Washington and the various State councils of defense are urging the largest possible acreage. The statement has been made repeatedly that we must try to produce a minimum of a billion bushels of wheat in 1918. For that billion bushel crop our Government will pay at least $2 per bushel, regardless of world conditions, regardless of whether the war continues, regardless of supply and demand. Is it fair, then, to fix for the present crop of 650,000,000 bushels an arbitrary price at a figure much below the market price under natural trading conditions, with a world shortage such as now exists and with an abnormal cost that has attached itself to the production of this crop? If cheap bread must be provided, will it not be more fair to follow the plan of France and Italy and let the Government, through taxes imposed on all the people and particularly on the wealth of the land, absorb the difference between the price of wheat and the cost of bread, rather than to compel one limited class of our people to bear the brunt of this sacrifice for the benefit of all?

The success of the food administration depends very largely upon the voluntary cooperation of all classes of our people. It is charged alike with the responsibility of fixing this wheat price and of securing the grain for our allies. If the wheat price should prove such a disappointment to the farmer as to create in him a feeling that he had been dealt with unjustly and a spirit of resentment; if he should withhold his wheat from the market and the Government should be compelled to commandeer that wheat; if he should refuse to plant this fall and next spring the acreage we need to have planted, the success of the food administration would be greatly impaired to say the least, and the opposition to it would become both bitter and widespread.

Please pardon the length of this letter and do not bother to answer it. I have written entirely with a view to giving you what information I can and trying to put before you what I know to be the honest opinions of many farmers.

With great respect, I am,

Sincerely, yours, JOUETT SHOUSE.

The United States at War.

OF

HON. JAMES H. DAVIDSON,

OF WISCONSIN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Speaker, this extra session of Congress is about to end. From April 2, when it convened, to the present hour its Members have devoted their best energies to the enactment of legislation necessary for the conduct of the war in which we are engaged.

During the political campaign of last year the people were led to believe that the President's diplomacy had not only "kept us out of war" but would continue so to do.

Following the election, however, it became apparent that the Nation was being drawn nearer and nearer the vortex in which practically all the civilized world had become engulfed.

It was generally understood that when the President convened Congress some action vitally affecting the Nation's interest would be taken. The entire Nation was ready to maintain, by force if necessary, the freedom of the seas and the protection of American citizens wherever they were. In defense of these principles the people were ready to wage war against the Imperial German Government, which had repeatedly violated them. They did not understand that this would require us to intervene in the European war, or that we would sit in and help determine the terms of settlement of European questions.

The President's message, however, plainly indicated his purpose of including the larger idea of engaging in a "war for world-wide democracy," to be carried on by armies chosen upon the principle of "universal service," and sustained by "all the resources of the Nation."

Those who favored and voted for the war resolution knew, or should have known, that it meant the conscription of men for service in European trenches and the conscription of wealth, in the way of bonds and taxes, foods, and all other national resources, for their maintenance and the maintenance of our allies.

A few of us hesitated to place this tremendous burden upon the people. We believed American rights could be protected without making it necessary for us to engage in a war over questions in dispute between European nations.

While we would willingly have supported a resolution for the exertion of such force as might be necessary to protect our rights upon the seas, we could not support a measure so far-reaching in its effects as the one proposed.

A majority of the Congress, however, adopted the resolution declaring that a state of war existed, and from that day to this those Members of the House who voted against the resolution have stood shoulder to shoulder with those who supported it, in favor of every measure desired by the President and necessary for the successful conduct of the war. We have each realized that, no matter how much we may have differed as to the necessity of our country engaging in this kind of a war, there could be no question as to the necessity of our winning it.

FINANCING THE WAR.

Congress at once undertook the work of preparing for war. It first obligated the Government to the extent of seven billions of dollars for war purposes. This bill passed the House April 14, 1917, 388 Members voting for it and not a single one against it. It provided funds not only for domestic expenditures, but three billions to be loaned to foreign Governments.

Later the House, again by a unanimous vote, further obligated the Government in the sum of eleven billions of dollars. This act authorized a further loan of four billions, making in all seven billions of dollars to be loaned to our allies.

These loans are absolutely necessary if those allies are to continue to maintain their armies in the field and their civilians at home.

The first authorization provided for nontaxable liberty bonds carrying an interest rate of 3½ per cent. The second authorization, under which liberty bonds are now being sold, provides an interest rate of 4 per cent, but these bonds are subject to an income tax on amounts above $5,000 owned by a single person. The purchaser of these bonds has a safe investment at a reasonable interest rate, and the further assurance that he is doing "his bit" in aiding his Government in financing the war.

In every war one of the difficult questions to be determined is, How much of its cost shall be borne by the present and how much by future generations; how much in bonds, how much in taxes?

So much depends on circumstances and conditions that any attempt to lay down a hard and fast rule in this respect would be inadvisable.

Those who favor large bond issues contend that as the war is being fought for the benefit of future generations they should bear the greater part of the burden; others contend that while a portion of the present generation is facing the enemies' guns at the front another portion is remaining at home fattening off the opportunity for excess profits that war always gives, and that these should bear, very largely, that portion which can be paid for in money, and that it is unfair to require those who go to the front and are fortunate enough to return to also in later years pay the bonds now issued in place of taxes.

There is no good reason why those who are engaged in present industries and who are not serving at the front should not contribute liberally to whatever amount is necessary for the support and equipment of those at the front.

This is especially true of those enjoying large incomes, and doubly so of those whose incomes are derived from excessive profits obtained through the production of munitions of war. If there ever was a time when a tax should be apportioned according to the ability to pay, that time is now. Care must, however, be taken to avoid "killing the goose that lays the golden egg." Nothing would be more harmful to the successful prosecution of the war than by overtaxation or other means to stifle industry, thereby interrupting business, closing factories, throwing labor out of employment, and otherwise disturbing the prosperity of the country.

The committees having the revenue bill in charge gave careful consideration to all these questions, and the act, concurred in by both branches of Congress unanimously on October 2, 1917, is offered with the hope that it will be received by the country not as a perfect tax measure but one so adjusted as to raise the largest possible amount of revenue with the least possible disturbance to business or distress to individuals.

The amount expected to be raised by it is $2,206,000,000.

Of this amount, $842,000,000 will be obtained from income taxes; $1,110,000,000 from excess profits; $220,000,000 from liquors, wines, and soft drinks; $57,000,000 from tobacco and cigars; $40,000,000 from automobiles; $50,000,000 from admissions to places of amusement; $74,000,000 from increases on postal rates on first and second class matter; and the balance from other lines of industry.

With this law in effect about 36 per cent of our war expenditures will come from taxes and about 64 per cent from bonds.

It is now estimated that at the end of the fiscal year there will be a deficit in the Treasury of about $3,000,000,000. This means that at the coming regular session of Congress additional bonds must be provided for and additional taxes levied. It will then be necessary, probably, to not only impose consumption taxes but make further levies on incomes and excess profits.

APPROPRIATIONS.

The appropriations already made and authorized for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, including the amounts loaned to our allies, and which are reimbursable, amount to $21,390,730,940.46.

Of this amount, over nineteen billions have been placed at the disposal of the administration to enable the country to properly conduct the operations incident to the war, and this was done by practically a unanimous vote of the Congress. The amount is so stupendous that the human mind can not grasp it.

It is interesting to compare it with the amounts expended by our allies for war purposes. Up to August 1 of this year—

Great Britain had expended	$18,500,000,000
France had expended	15,327,400,000
Italy had expended	3,120,000,000
Russia had expended	15,000,000,000

But these cover a period of three years, whereas ours are within the first six months of the first year of the war and before a gun has been fired or a shell exploded.

What the future expenditure will be time alone can tell. Some of the items for this year, such as the building of cantonments, and so forth, will not have to be repeated, but on the other hand it may be necessary to expend much larger sums in other directions. We must therefore face the future with the grim determination to expend whatever amount is necessary to enable our country to win this war at the earliest possible moment.

RAISING AN ARMY.

Next to the declaration of war the act which came closer to the people than any other was the one by which provision was made for raising an army.

Wars can not be fought without men. Previous laws had provided for a small Regular Army of men between the ages of 18 and 30 years, and a National Guard of men between the ages of 18 and 45. These were all volunteers.

Additional legislation was necessary to provide an army of sufficient size to meet this emergency. The War Department proposed a plan which was given careful consideration by the House Military Affairs Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member. A majority of the committee recommended a few changes in the department's plan. These related to the maintenance of State units of the National Guard, the age limit of men called to the service, and the application of the volunteer system in the first instance.

The committee's plan for the maintenance of State units of the National Guard was accepted and is a part of the law.

The general plan to raise the Regular Army and the National Guard to war strength by the voluntary enlistment of men between the ages of 18 and 40 years, with the further provision that if enough volunteers were not obtained conscription would apply to the balance, which would give an army of over 900,000 men, largely of volunteers, was accepted without objection.

The department further proposed to then raise, by conscription, an additional army of 500,000, and if necessary another increment of the same number, of men from 19 to 25 years of age.

After exempting those having dependents, the burden of such an army would largely fall on boys from 19 to 25 years of age.

The committee believed this was unfair to the school boys of the country, and recommended an age limit of from 21 to 40 years. This was adopted after the conference had reduced the maximum to 30 years.

The committee's bill provided all the necessary machinery for conscription, and authorized the President to put it in operation at once.

It was conceded that it would require four or five months to prepare a list of those eligible for service, and a much longer period before those drafted could be trained.

There was an insistent demand that troops be sent to France at the earliest possible moment. It was believed that if volunteers were called for thousands of men, many of whom had had previous military training, would enlist for foreign service.

Certain prominent and popular citizens who had served as volunteers were ready to raise and organize divisions, and the committee believed these could be made ready for transport at a much earlier date than would be possible under conscription. Its plan, therefore, after giving the President the necessary authority for levying conscription, authorized him, in the meantime, to call for volunteers, giving him authority, when the conscription rolls had been completed, to draft the number necessary to complete the quota.

This was simply a recognition of the custom always heretofore observed and now recognized in raising the Regular Army and the National Guard to war strength.

Although the committee's plan was not adopted, it is interesting to note that on the 6th day of September, five months after war was declared and before a single drafted soldier was in training, there were in the Army of the United States 819,881 men and in the Navy 254,267, a total of 1,074,146, every one of whom was a volunteer.

Conscription of men for service is never popular. The present is probably no exception, but when a country is in war it must have power to raise necessary armies for its defense.

The conscription plan has been adopted, and under it nearly 10,000,000 men have been registered and over 600,000 are now in training. It is the law, and prompt and complete compliance with its provisions is the duty of every citizen.

AVIATION.

Another vitally important step in forming this great army was taken when the Military Affairs Committee prepared and submitted to the House a bill for the reorganization of the Signal Corps of the Army by enlarging the Aviation Section thereof and making provision for the construction and operation of airplanes in large numbers. The bill carried an appropriation of $640,000,000. It was prepared by the committee in executive sessions and accepted by both the House and the Senate unanimously and without amendment and without giving publicity to the details of its provisions.

It is sufficient to say that under this act thousands of airplanes of the best-known type are now being constructed, equipped with the new "Liberty" engine and other American-made devices, which will enable them to serve as the eye of the Army and lead it to victory through the air.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' INDEMNITY AND INSURANCE.

When the Government puts a man in its military service it destroys his insurability and, very largely, his earning power. The least it can do in return is to make restitution so far as is possible. This is the only just and humane thing to do.

Congress therefore has enacted a law under which the Government will do certain things as a part of the compensation for the patriotic service the soldier and sailor renders. If he is single, it will pay him 4 per cent interest on so much of his pay as he may leave on deposit; if married, it requires him to allot $15 from his month's pay to his wife and children for their support. To this the Government will add another $15 for the wife, with an increase for each child. If the soldier has neither wife nor child, but has other dependent relatives, it will make an allowance to them, providing the soldier also allots $15 a month out of his pay. If the soldier is killed in battle or dies as a result of wounds or disease incurred in the service, his wife will receive a minmum pension of $30 per month, with an additional allowance for each child. If he returns partially or totally disabled permanently, he will receive a pension ranging from $40 to $200 per month.

The soldier also has the opportunity to buy from the Government insurance of from $1,000 up to $10,000 at $8 per year for each $1,000 of insurance.

The average insurance rate for men 21 years of age is $8 per thousand. If he enters the war, his insurance is either canceled or the rate increased to $58 per year.

Under this law the Government, therefore, gives to each soldier a bonus equivalent to $50 per annum on each $1,000 of insurance for which he is willing to pay $8 per year.

The purpose of this act is to secure the future of American soldiers and sailors by insuring their lives and providing adequate compensation and indemnities for loss of life and total or partial permanent disability, and to protect their families against poverty and want by providing them with sufficient means of support during the absence of the men at the front.

It does not affect existing pension laws, except that after October 6, 1917, widows of officers or enlisted men of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States who served in the Civil War, the War with Spain, or the Philippine insurrection will receive $25 per month.

These are but a few of the many constructive laws enacted at this session.

Others, which can only be referred to, include the appropriation of $162,500,000 to provide for the production, conserving the supply, controlling the distribution, and fixing the price of food and fuel; to increase the enlisted strength of the Navy and the Marine Corps; to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy; to punish acts of interference with foreign relations, neutrality, and foreign commerce; priority of shipment and car-service control in interstate commerce; authorizing the President to commandeer ships and shipbuilding supplies. Many of these laws confer very great and almost autocratic power upon the President of the United States; but he is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy and these are war measures. All of them seemed necessary in order that the administration might have a free hand in carrying on the war operations, and they were enacted promptly and practically unanimously.

Six months ago to-day war was declared. When that act was passed we were utterly unprepared for war. Within these six months those of us who have been here constantly and who have seen the Nation awaken from its dream of peace to its conscious strength as a mighty power for war appreciate the remarkable progress made in that brief period.

The mobilization and concentration of this power commenced when war was declared. Directed by the heads of the various departments and aided by men of the highest skill and experience in various lines of industry who, through a patriotic endeavor to do their shares, have given freely and without compensation of their time and energy, this mobilization went on until this great war machine, so constructed and operated, is now influencing and directing all the industries and resources of this great country in the work of raising, training, equipping, feeding, and transporting the boys who will carry our flag to victory upon foreign fields and who will sacrifice life itself, if necessary, in the defense of the principles so dear to us and to them.

Mr. Speaker, the action taken by this Congress in the early hours of that fateful April morning brought a feeling of sorrow to American hearts and homes. No one wanted war, and everyone regretted sincerely the necessity which made it necessary for our country to engage therein.

This was especially true of those citizens of foreign birth or ancestry who still cherish in their hearts that tender memory which every decent man has for the place of his birth.

In the district I have the honor to represent reside many of these citizens. They are as law-abiding, liberty loving, generous, and patriotic as can be found in any section of the country. There never has been any question of their loyalty to this country, and they are ready to do, and are doing, their full duty in its behalf. They have contributed generously in aid of the Red Cross, and are now subscribing freely for liberty bonds. They are doing their utmost for food production and conservation, and, as on all previous occasions, when their country needed men for its defense they have been quick to respond to the call.

Wisconsin's governor has stated that over 65 per cent of its quota of soldiers—and it promptly furnished its full quota—are of foreign birth or ancestry.

I am certain that my district exceeds that percentage. These patriotic boys did not wait for conscription, but volunteered, and in such numbers that in some of the local districts the full quota was thus furnished and none has been summoned under the draft.

What better evidence can be offered of their loyalty and devotion to their country?

To the fathers and mothers whose sons have thus pledged their lives my heart goes out in sympathy. I can sympathize with them, for their lot is my lot.

One of my sons is a volunteer in the Navy and the other offered his services and now awaits his call. What their fate is to be I can not know. I can only wait and hope, but "hope's brightest robes will be broidered with the sable fringe of fear."

Our first duty, however, is to our country. We are in war. The honor and integrity—yea, even the very principles for which our country stands—are at stake. In such an hour the thought of every American citizen should be:

> My country, my country, may she ever be right;
> But, right or wrong, my country.

Throughout this important session, so momentous in the life of our country, and during which so much legislation touching the vital interests of its citizens has been enacted, this thought has governed my actions.

Every man owes to his country whatever he has to give. I have given constantly of my time and strength in this work without reference to personal or political considerations.

I have felt that we are engaged in a stupendous undertaking. This great struggle will not be easily won. Each of us must sacrifice and be prepared to make still further and greater sacrifices.

Our boys—your sons and mine—will be at the front united in our defense. They are entitled to and must have the united support of those at home.

Let us, therefore, persevere without faltering until an honorable and lasting peace can be obtained. God grant it may come before our boys actually reach the trenches; but if not, let us have faith that out of it all will come a brighter, better day, when wars shall be no more.

If this can be the result, then the war will have been worth all its cost and we will be consoled with the thought that the precious lives taken, the terrible sacrifices made, the immense treasure expended, were not in vain.

War-Revenue Bill.

OF

HON. CORDELL HULL,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the American Government is now engaged in prosecuting a great war. To this end men and money are necessary. From the fateful days of July and August, 1914, when the present world-wide conflagration broke and commenced to spread over Europe, it has been utterly impossible for any person to follow in full detail its course or to fathom all the underlying causes and motives or to grasp all the issues and satisfactorily appraise their merits.

Naturally, the President of the United States, having the benefit of innumerable channels of official information through which all available facts, secret and otherwise, have come to him daily since and before its outbreak, has been in the best possible attitude to discover and understand controlling causes, conditions, and motives back of the world war, as thus revealed to him. From those early days of this great conflict when Germany, pretending only to threaten Russia, proceeded instead to mobilize her chief forces on the French border, on the opposite side of the German Empire from Russia, the outstanding fact, now beyond dispute, that the German Government had suddenly embarked upon its hitherto secret plan of world conquest and world dominion, became apparent. Both at the beginning and for a long period thereafter many other nations looked on in horror and hoped that they might be able to remain out of this awful conflict with honor and safety.

Strange as it may seem, one peaceable and peace-loving country after another has been drawn in, under circumstances impossible to avoid without such sacrifices of honor and of God-given rights as no country could make and long endure. Austria, Serbia, Germany, Turkey, Russia, Belgium, France, England, Japan, Italy, Bulgaria, Portugal, Roumania, Montenegro, China, and the United States have drawn the sword either offensively or defensively, while the 11 Central and South American nations of Cuba, Panama, Brazil, Bolivia, Guatemala, Peru, Honduras, Nicaragua, Uruguay, Haiti, and San Domingo have either declared war or broken diplomatic relations with Germany or the central powers. All these 23 nations of the world are thus ranged against the Governments of Germany, Austria, Turkey, and Bulgaria in the necessary protection of their present and future rights, liberties, and civilization. If any citizen doubts the justice or the necessity of the defensive war now being waged against these central powers of Europe by practically the balance of the world, he has only to look to the deliberate and unanimous verdict of these 23 unbiased and unoffending nations for infallible proof to the contrary.

My remarks have to deal with the share of the American Government in financing this war. We must not only raise money to support and maintain the Army and Navy, but we must in substantial measure help to finance our allies. In this connection the statement in the House of Commons on July 24, 1917, of the British chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Bonar Law, defining the principle on which the English Government has acted in making loans to her allies, is pertinent, as follows:

> We have held from the first—and it is true of the three Governments which are responsible for the conduct of the war—that it was not a question of our fighting by ourselves or of our considering solely what should be done for our own forces. We have held that in reality it was one campaign that was being waged, and that what we had to do was to assist by every means in our power the general conduct of that campaign, involving as it did assistance to our allies as freely as money spent upon our own services.

The necessities of their situation has constrained this Government to provide loans to leading allied nations aggregating $7,000,000,000 for the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1917. We do not, however, expect this to become a burden to the United States. Every nation will strive to meet its honest obligations.

First, I may say that the financial policies thus far adopted by the United States have received world-wide commendation. Our financial and business conditions are sound and present the best possible situation to weather the storms of war. For this, the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and Congress are entitled to great credit. Let us now turn to our domestic finances.

Prior to the war our domestic expenditures, including the Postal Service, would not much exceed $1,000,000,000. During 1916, however, the Government felt constrained to enter upon a system of additional preparedness to the extent of making substantial increases in the Army and Navy and coastwise fortifications. To meet these new expenditures Congress enacted the revenue acts of September 8, 1916, and March 3, 1917, estimated to yield some $425,000,000 additional revenue. Since the entry of the United States into the war in April last an entirely new system of war revenues and expenditures, of course, become necessary. Dealing alone with actual appropriations and expenditures for the present fiscal year and omitting the amounts of contracts and authorizations and certain other items of expenses which are reimbursable, such as foreign loans and interest thereon, including the foreign loan of $7,000,000,000, the sinking fund, war-risk insurance, etc., we have total cash appropriations of $11,650,000,000 which must be met from taxes and bonds during the present fiscal year ending June 30, 1918,

This includes our normal domestic expenditures and shows a total daily expenditure of nearly $32,000,000 for 1916–17. Our estimated tax revenues under former laws is $1,333,500,000 and under the newly enacted war-revenue act, $2,534,870,000, and postal receipts $325,000,000, aggregating revenues and receipts of $4,193,370,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

Strict accuracy would require allowance as to the amount of new and additional special taxes which will only be in operation from 7 to 9 months of this fiscal year.

Deducting this sum from the estimated actual expenditures of $11,650,000,000 for the present fiscal year leaves a balance of $7,456,000,000 to be provided for. The recent act of September 24, 1917, authorizes bonds to the extent of $3,539,000,000. This would leave expenditures of $3,916,000,000 to be provided for during the present year either by additional taxation or by bonds. The contract authorizations aggregating $2,511,000,000 also will have to be later taken care of when the expenditures become necessary.

The larger expenditures of the United States, as compared with the expenditures of some other governments at war during its early stages can well be accounted for upon different important grounds. The new program for the increase and development of aviation called for an additional $640,000,000; our great shop-building program demands $750,000,000, aud an authorized program ultimately involving $2,000,000,000. Certain other extraordinary items of expenditure could be mentioned. Furthermore, when the war commenced and for a time thereafter, prices were not nearly as high as during the period when and since the United States entered the war. They also had more or less price regulation in England and other countries, especially as it related to war materials and military supplies. It is true, however, that these same countries paid high and gradually higher prices for war supplies purchased in the United States. The cost of maintaining our Army and Navy is much greater than in other countries. Finally, it may be said that when the United States entered the war it had a thorough grasp of its magnitude, and profiting by the mistakes of other governments at war, it proceeded at once to throw its whole force and power and resources in many respects into the war. This huge undertaking calls for financing on the broadest scale almost from the beginning.

The much-discussed question of what proportion of expenditures during the war should be met by taxes and by bonds arises. I recently stated in the House my views relative to this matter. It may be of interest in this connection, however, to compare the course of different countries at war in meeting expenditures to this time. Under existing tax levies and appropriations, including both peace and war levies and appropriations, the United States during the present fiscal year would defray 36 per cent of expenditures from taxation. Striking out $1,000,000,000 peace receipts and expenditures, the percentage computation of the amount of war expenditures met by taxes would be not exceeding 30 per cent. This is a far better showing than any other country has made.

While England during the war has met 26 per cent of her total expenditures by taxation, she really paid only 19 per cent of her war expenditures by taxation, during the last fiscal year ending March 31, 1917, a computation arrived at by first deducting the peace receipts and expenditures. This latter method of computation also changes the ratio for the entire war. On May 6, 1917, the British chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Bonar Law, speaking in the House of Commons, said:

> Our total national expenditures during the war have been $21,590,000,000, of which $5,685,000,000 has been met by revenue, and the remainder of $15,925,000,000 from loans.

The British expenditure for the last fiscal year ending March 31, 1917, was $10,990,500,000, of which $2,867,140,000 was met by taxes, and the remainder of $8,123,360,000 from loans.

The English prewar receipts and expenditures were about $900,000,000. From August 1, 1914, to March 31, 1915, England expended $2,440,000,000. From March 31, 1915, to March 31, 1916, she expended $7,790,000,000, and from March 31, 1916, to March 31, 1917, $10,990,000,000. These various annual expenditures, however, include loans to the allies amounting to $5,855,000,000. England, since March 31 and prior to July 24, 1917, loaned her allies $985,000,000.

England's total votes of credit during the war and up to March 31, 1918, are $26,460,000,000. The total of the English daily national expenditure was just over $10,000,000 per day from the beginning of the war to March 31, 1915. During the following fiscal year ending March 31, 1916, it rose to $21,500,000 per day, while for the next fiscal year ending March 31, 1917, it exceeded $30,000,000 per day.

From February to May, 1917, the expenditures of the German Government were at the rate of $9,000,000,000 a year, or $25,000,000 a day, as compared with the rate of $6,000,000,000 per year, or $17,500,000 per day in the first half of 1916. This excludes normal budget expenditures, which includes advances made to her allies and several other items. While Germany's war expenditures during her last fiscal year were $6,050,000,000, they have increased 50 per cent this year, making $9,075,000,000. Her expenditures have been almost equal to those of England. Germany's total expenditures from August 1, 1914, to February 23, 1917, were $19,750,000,000.

Credits voted for all purposes by the French Chamber for the quarter April to June, 1917, show an average expenditure of $8,220,000,000, or $22,345,000 per day. It is true, however, that her vote of credit for the third quarter of 1917 was at the rate of $6,316,800,000 a year, or $17,546,000 per day. Similar votes for the whole of 1916 were $4,732,500,000, and like votes for the whole of 1915 were $3,152,800,000, according to the most reliable data available. The total French votes of credit from the beginning of the war until June 30, 1917, amounted to $16,060,000,000.

The total war expenditures of Canada, in both Canada and Europe, to July 30, 1917, was $623,000,000. Her estimated expenses of maintenance of troops in France from September 30, 1916, to July 20, 1917, at 6 shillings per man on an average of 117,000 troops, was $234,000,000 of the sum just stated. The war expenditures of Canada from April 1 to July 30 of this year, both at home and abroad, was $92,000,000, or the rate of $840,000 per day. This was her rate of war expenditures on July 20.

I shall now briefly refer to the methods and extent of war taxation as adopted both at home and abroad. The British tax receipts, omitting receipts from postal, telegraph, and telephone service, and miscellaneous, all of which are considered nontax revenue, have been as follows: For the fiscal year ending March 31, 1914, $815,000,000; for the year ending March 31, 1915, $945,000,000; for the year ending March 31, 1916, $1,450,000,000; for the year ending March 31, 1917, $2,570,000,000. During the same period the nontax revenue rose from $175,000,000 in the fiscal year 1914 to $295,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1917. The English customs taxes rose from $177,000,000 in the fiscal year 1914 to $350,800,000 in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1917. Her excise taxes rose from $138,000,000 in 1914 to $281,000,000 at the end of March, 1917. These excises related chiefly to liquors, tobacco, sugar, coffee, and tea. The estate taxes rose from $136,000,000 in 1914 to $156,000,000 in the year ending March 31, 1917. The income tax receipts rose from $236,000,000 in 1914 to $1,025,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1917. The receipts from excess-profits tax, which was originally enacted late in 1915, were $700,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1917, and are estimated to yield $1,000,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1918. These comprise the principal increases of tax revenues made from time to time during the war in Great Britain. Her normal income-tax rate, which was nominally 5 per cent, and her supertax rate, which was a flat 2½ per cent, have been gradually raised, until at present the nominal rate of the normal tax is 25 per cent and the effect of the supertax rates reaches as high as 42½ per cent. The full effect of the combined rates applies to incomes of $10,000 and upward. The supertax commences there. By a system of abatements the 25 per cent normal tax rate is reduced in its effect on small incomes, so that it amounts to a fraction over 1 per cent on the smallest income subject to tax. The exemption was lowered to $650, but during the past summer, when the cost of living became so high, it was raised to $750. Persons often confuse direct and indirect taxation in Great Britain. Indirect taxation embraces excises as well as customs, while direct taxation relates mainly to property, income, and estate taxation.

Germany has only raised $425,000,000 from additional taxation during the war, as compared with Great Britain's $2,000,000,000.

Due to the fact that many of her chief industrial Provinces have been invaded and occupied by the enemy, France made but little headway in levying war taxes until recently. The increase of her revenues for 1916 over 1915 was $160,000,000. She now has in operation income, excess profits, and certain minor war-tax levies.

Turning to our own war-tax methods and measures, in discussing the war-revenue bill which passed the House in May last, I stated on the 22d of that month that—

> In view of the fact that we may be entering a somewhat long war, too much careful investigation and consideration of the principles of sound taxation and all phases of each item proposed to be taxed, and the formulation of an equitable and comprehensive initial revenue measure, can not well be given. With a basis of taxation thus established on lines broad and sound, one story after another of taxation could be added, if necessary, as the war progresses and our revenue needs increase without disturbance of business or economic conditions and without the necessity of constantly readjusting or patching up our tax structure. * * * The first problem confronting the committee in its work of framing this measure was to determine upon what lines or principles of taxation the new levy should be made. The committee wisely, in my judgment, decided that the chief portion of the new taxes should come off of wealth, luxuries, and pleasure. I am in the heartiest accord with these general principles, as I am with the committee in this general course or policy as consistently pursued.

I have no reason now to modify the foregoing views. The expenses of the war should be borne by those who are really able to bear them. During the present period of enormously high prices with respect to articles of prime necessity upon which the poor must subsist, great care should be exercised by Congress to see that the average poor family is able to procure what is commonly termed the "minimum of subsistence" free from any tax burdens. This doctrine is based upon the right of people to live, to exist. And I do not believe it is in the heart of those fortunate enough to have surplus property or earnings to see others less fortunate who wage an honest, constant struggle to secure a livelihood shiver in the cold or go to bed hungry from utter lack of ability to supply themselves with urgent necessities because of tax burdens.

While I strongly favor an equitable distribution of taxes spread out over as many taxpayers as possible, I would not, except as a last resort, by taxation add to the hunger and cold and destitution of this latter class of people, while prices are so high, upon the theory that every single person should be required to contribute something in the form of a tax to the Government.

The new war-revenue measure just enacted is estimated to yield $2,534,870,000; $200,000,000 of the preparedness fund under revenue acts of 1916, and March, 1917, are also properly war taxes. It passed the House in May, and after many months' consideration in the Senate and some two weeks' consideration in conference, has now become a law. It is due those Members of the House and Senate, my colleagues, who had principally in hand the work of drafting and perfecting this measure, that deserved recognition should be given to their long and painstaking labors and their sincere and patriotic efforts to evolve a measure which would both respond to the needs of the Treasury and impose the tax burdens as fairly and equitably as possible and according to the ability of the taxpayers to bear them.

Each of these gentlemen in both the House and the Senate deserve the highest compliments for the zeal, ability, and singleness of purpose which they have uniformly exhibited in their efforts to secure sound, adequate, and equitable revenue legislation to meet the needs of the war. It is always true, however, that comprehensive revenue legislation embracing manifold subjects does not reflect the views of any one person. It must be the result of concession and compromise. Naturally, therefore, each Member participating in the preparation of such legislation must be disappointed with respect to some of the items finally agreed upon. The balance of the membership of the two Houses in turn suffer like disappointments. This is not the time, however, for carping criticism of such legislation on the part of any citizen. Any adverse criticism should be of a friendly character, looking alone to constructive remedies for hurtful defects in the measure.

In passing judgment on our war-revenue legislation, cheerfully accepting its necessity, two inquiries naturally arise in the public mind: Do such war measures embrace equitable, scientific taxation? To what extent does it, in connection with the total tax burdens, affect the ability of the country to pay?

Commenting on the last question first, the unlimited resources, boundless energy, and enormous productive capacity of this country are too familiar to require special showing here. Attention in this connection may be called to the additional fact that of the world's total gold supply of $8,560,000,000, the United States has more than $3,000,000,000. This places our country in the strongest possible economic and credit position. The ratio of gold to our national wealth of $200,000,000,000 is less than 1 to 70, while its ratio to our public debt is still almost nominal. While Europe is flooded with practically fiat paper money to the extent of $13,500,000,000, we have none. It is true that this country does not retain on hand an amount of surplus from annual production and savings in relative proportion to some other countries, such as England, who had some $20,000,000,000 loaned abroad at the outbreak of the war. This is due to the fact that ours is still largely an undeveloped country when compared with the old countries elsewhere, with the result that a substantial portion of our annual profits are applied to extensions and new developments in commerce and industry. When we take England as the most suitable country for comparison, as many do, for the reason that she has heretofore had something like half our wealth and population, it is necessary to bear in mind one important consideration in comparing relative tax burdens in the two countries. The American people are paying an amount near $1,800,000,000 of actual taxes to the States and their subdivisions. This amount added to the entire estimated Federal tax revenues of $3,868,000,000 would aggregate total tax burdens in the United States of $5,668,000,000. On the other hand, while the Federal tax levy of England is now near $3,000,000,000, the amount of actual taxes imposed for her counties and municipalities, not including nontax receipts, is but little more than $500,000,000, and of this amount the General Government collects and turns over between one-fourth and one-third. There are no States, and only 53 counties in England, while the municipalities are comparatively limited in number.

The fact that greater margins of profits are made in the United States than in England would enable the payment of correspondingly larger taxes. I have not doubted, and do not now doubt, the ability of the American people, without material injury or dislocation of business, to pay the amount of taxes now imposed, and also to pay substantially increased amounts if the war should continue for another year. My individual views when the United States entered the war in April were that it would be wise at that time to limit the subjects of taxation to a few large and general tax items, such as incomes, excess profits, estate, liquors, tobacco, and a very few other items of taxation embracing luxuries and pleasure, to the extent of about $1,800,000,000. At that time our estimated expenditures for the present fiscal year were only $3,800,000,000. Then later in the year and during the present fall, when our expenditures had materially increased and the country had gotten well into the war, increases and extensions in taxation should be made which would suitably respond to the increasing Treasury demands and work no serious hardship to the taxpayers. Following this second step, such further increases and extensions of tax levies would be made during the year 1918 as the conditions of the taxpayers and the demands of the war might suggest.

The fact, however, that the revenue bill passed by the House in May last did not become a law until the second stage of the tax program just stated had been reached, the increased amount of taxes carried in the bill as finally agreed to measurably accomplishes the same results. I hope I may be pardoned for reiterating a statement heretofore made, that the matter of paramount concern in imposing taxes relates to comprehensive and equitable laws rather than the rates they carry. The ability of the country to pay necessary war taxes is very great under such a system of sound and equitable taxation. I fear that heretofore too much thought has been given merely to the fixing of rates and entirely too little to the working out of accurate and detailed provisions of laws which would carve through the profits of every taxpayer—corporation, partnership, and individual—with accuracy and relative fairness.

"Fixing rates," which has been so much proclaimed, is easy enough after the far greater work of drafting an equitable tax measure is completed. The drafting of our big internal tax laws should require many months' labor as to their technical and business phases.

The combined income-tax rates are estimated to yield $1,201,000,000 for 1917. The great part this tax plays with respect to our war revenues is a reminder of the expression of Gladstone that "the income tax is an engine of gigantic power in time of war," and of the more recent utterance of Lloyd-George that this tax is "the center and sheet anchor of our financial system."

When it gets into full operation the estate tax will yield $110,000,000 annually. The combined yield of the income and estate taxes would thus be $1,311,000,000. This amount comprises more than one-third of the present total war and peace tax levies of the Government and it comes off of wealth, which is able to bear it and should do so. It is with some pride that I can claim responsibility for working out or selecting the methods and preparing the original drafts of these two measures, which later passed Congress without fundamental changes. It is also gratifying to see Canada during the past few weeks enact an income-tax law patterned almost entirely after our Federal law, rather than adopt the English phraseology and plan. Several States have either adopted, or are considering the adoption of, income-tax laws which comprise features or modified provisions of the Federal law. The new revenue law just enacted contains a number of amendments of a minor character to the income tax act of 1913 as revised by the act of 1916. It is most unfortunate that any needed changes of minor provisions were not made in a manner that would leave the law virtually intact. Instead, entire pages of the act of 1916 have been repealed and reenacted in the new law for the sole purpose of inserting minor amendments comprising but a few lines—in fact, section 1200 of the act of October 3, 1917, takes practically the entire definition of income out of the original statute and reenacts it without the change of a word.

Many of the other income-tax amendments that follow in title 12 of the new law take entire sections and pages out of the body of the act of 1916 and reenact them for the wholly useless purpose of carrying one amendment through the different appropriate provisions of the act of 1916. The inevitable result of this method of making amendments is to scatter important provisions of the income-tax law of 1916 through different subsequent laws so that neither laymen nor lawyers can easily locate the separate enactments, bring them together, and ascertain just what the law is. Most of these amendments could have been written compactly within the space of a few pages and made to refer to the appropriate provisions of the income-tax act of 1916, without this system of useless repeals and reenactments. We now have in separate laws three so-called normal taxes, two supertaxes, and two exemptions, whereas all could have been combined in one simple provision. The new war-revenue act carries a provision substituting "information at the source" for the chief features of "collection at the source" as contained in the income-tax act of 1916. I shall have serious misgivings as to the wisdom of this change until its superiority over the former method of securing the tax is demonstrated. Either method has its objections. The trouble and expense of each to both the Government and the citizens affected are virtually the same. My judgment is that the largest factor in the success of the English income tax has been collection at the source. It has operated as the surest possible safeguard against evasion by the taxpayer and loss of revenue to the Government. The English system assesses all kinds of income possible at the source and before it reaches the hands of the taxpayer. Under this system each taxpayer is sure that his neighbor is paying his full share and is not escaping, with the result that he more cheerfully pays his tax. Under the system of information at the source one taxpayer is called on to report on his neighbor or his employee, or some other person with whom he may have close business associations. A citizen is more disposed to withhold from another money for taxes due the Government and turn such trust fund over to the Government than he is to report tax liabilities of his neighbors, friends, and associates. I earnestly trust that the information at the source may prove the success its authors predict for it; otherwise the same ground will later have to be retraced with respect to restoring, gradually developing, and making more comprehensive and effective collection at the source. As one Member, I acquiesced in the Treasury's insistence with great reluctance.

In the first draft of the income-tax act of 1913 was contained the provision defining earned and unearned incomes and prescribing reduced rates for the former. The necessity of this provision is far greater now than then, for the reason that the exemptions have been lowered to $1,000 and $2,000. The absolute fairness of a provision which requires persons receiving incomes from invested wealth and without personal labor to pay larger rates than those imposed on the salaries and wages arising from personal exertion the year round is too manifest for argument. The soundness of this tax policy is almost universally accepted.

The recent amendments to the income-tax law embrace provisions allowing certain exemptions for minor children and also for charitable contributions. It is true that the laws of some other countries whose exemptions range low and from $50 to $800 do provide exemptions for a certain number of minor children in cases where the income of the taxpayer does not exceed a certain amount. But I know of no case where such exemptions are prescribed for the benefit of taxpayers whose incomes exceed $2,500. People of large incomes have no claim on this class of exemptions, and it is against income-tax policy generally to allow them.

It is true that many other income-tax laws allow limited exemptions of income contributed to charitable purposes. The fact that most tax laws commence with exemptions of one character or another and end with exemptions has resulted in the accumulation of property in the United States of $15,000,000,000 to $18,000,000,000 exempt from all taxation. During recent years many local and general laws here and elsewhere have either imposed a small flat tax rate on charitable contributions or upon those above a fair amount prescribed as a minimum. With this great amount of property, as just stated, already exempted, added to the principal of our Federal bonds issued and to be issued during the war, which will be exempt as such, it would appear to be wise policy not to allow an amount of wealth and property so enormous to get entirely without the range of any kind of taxation. The Government, the States, counties, and municipalities are more and more assuming these charitable burdens, and the time is approaching when they will care for them to a much greater extent. Under the new exemption provision referred to, a citizen having an income of $10,000,000 may donate $1,500,000 free of tax to some great institution. Under our present income-tax rates, aggregating more than 60 per cent, the effect of this transaction would be that the Government would really donate 60 per cent and the taxpayer only 40 per cent, but the taxpayer would get the entire credit for the donation while the Government would suffer the loss of $900,000 war taxes.

There are some marked differences in the substantive provisions of the English and American laws as they affect income. The English law does not provide any allowance for depletion of mines. It taxes the rental value of real estate and of residences occupied by the owners so as to place landlords and tenants on a parity as to the tax. It allows no deduction for interest on indebtedness. It taxes all governmental salaries and interest on all Government, county, and municipal bonds. It makes the income of husband and wife one, in estimating total income for supertax. It makes the family the unit of income in chief measure for the purpose of the normal tax. While the sentimental, and sometimes the just, side is persuasive, yet if our Federal law treated family income as the English law does, its yield would be $100,000,000 additional. It is always so easy for the husband to distribute his income among members of his family and thereby cut the tax rate in half or less. If our law were as comprehensive in all respects as the English provisions probably $250,000,000 would be added to its revenue yield.

It is difficult to sustain the view that the clause of the Constitution providing that the compensation of Federal judges "shall not be diminished during their continuance in office" was intended by the framers of the Constitution to exempt them from tax rates—or increase of tax rates when once applicable to a judge or judges—imposed uniformly on all salaries of all citizens in the United States. The provision must have contemplated a prohibition against an act of Congress specifically and directly reducing judges' salaries, and thereby affecting the independence of the judiciary. If Congress should classify the salaries of Federal judges and lay a different tax than that imposed on all other salaries of like amount, the constitutional inhibition might apply.

Very considerable increases of revenue to the extent of several hundred millions can be derived from our income tax during next year, if necessary for war purposes, without injustice or hardship to the taxpayers.

During the war when revenue needs have been urgent and earnings in many lines abnormally large, an excess-profits tax has been enacted by many governments. Swollen profits earned under war conditions have been most inviting as a subject of taxation, and justly so. I have strongly favored such tax since the summer of 1916. The great puzzle is and has been as to how to impose this tax most equitably. It is virtually impossible to write an excess-profits tax law which can be administered so as to avoid inequities resulting in serious hardships and injustices in many cases. Speaking of the English excess-profits law, which is the best considered draft and the best revenue-producing law in operation, on May 2, 1917, after it had been tried out for more than a year, the British chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Bonar Law, said:

> It does tell very unfairly, and it is inevitable that it should. * * * It tells unfairly against one trade as against another trade. In many cases it tells against particular methods of carrying on trade as against other methods of carrying on the same trade. I recognize all that.

We can only seek—and we should do this—to effect the minimum of inequalities.

Notwithstanding, some 14 Governments, including our own, have been convinced of the absolute wisdom and necessity of thus dealing with abnormal profits and thereby meeting imperative revenue requirements. As a sound economic proposition profits of many businesses and classes of business which have become swollen under war conditions should be reached by some kind of special tax. It matters little as to the name by which the tax is called. We already have in this country an additional or surtax on the total incomes of individuals in excess of $5,000. The so-called excess-profits tax is but another additional or surtax levied in crude form on the profits or income of corporations, partnerships, and individuals, derived for the most part from invested capital not in excess of $5,000, as in case of the present income surtax on individuals, but in excess of $3,000 in case of corporations and $6,000 in case of individuals and partnerships, plus an additional amount of profits or income computed mainly on a percentage of capital invested, under certain detailed provisions of the law. This war-tax provision is therefore equivalent to an additional or surtax on corporations and partnerships, and a second surtax on individuals, but computed somewhat differently from the income additional or surtax. Technically it is at least almost a surtax on income of the taxpayer rather than business. It is not a war excess-profits tax, because some taxpayers earning more before the war than now will be subject to the tax. The law really defines all profits in excess of a certain percentage of the capital invested, plus the statutory exemption, as excess profits and applies a system of graduated rates thereto. The occasion and the idea of this tax first arose in Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and certain States in Germany early in 1915, when in the search for governmental revenue it was observed that certain businesses and classes of business were deriving abnormal profits from conditions produced by the war. The plan to tax extra profits made as a direct result of the war was advanced. This took form in several early enactments in other countries. A little later the fact that trade and business generally was deriving unusual and extra profits made it impossible to distinguish those due to the war and those due to other conditions, and led to the broadening of the scope of the tax until it now applies generally to all profits in excess of the amount prescribed as the deduction or datum line.

There is but little uniformity in the various laws as to the original period covered, the precise scope of the tax, and the standard above which the excess is measured. Our new Federal provision in its effects practically adopts the so-called "capital percentage" standard. While it is true that a trade or business earning profits not less than 7 per cent nor more than 9 per cent of its capital before the war may compute according to the prewar standard of years, yet in order to administer this as well as the other provisions of the law it will be necessary in every case to compute the percentage of earnings on capital invested. Naturally the great problem has been to devise such a definition of "capital invested" as would enable the Government to administer the law with the minimum of hardships and injustices to certain businesses and classes of business or trade. At the outset the first impression seemed to be that the definition of "capital invested" for the purpose of computing the standard of deduction, or the prescribed normal-profit basis, should be the same definition of capital as understood in the ordinary commercial sense. In some important respects, however, the definition must be different. The net worth of a corporation, or the value of it if it were going into liquidation, is one proposition, while a definition of "capital invested" for the purpose of this excess-profits tax deduction is in certain particulars another proposition. Theoretically, the true inquiry would be, What amount of capital was employed in producing the profits in question less the amount of liabilities incurred in the same connection? The practical impossibility of ascertaining such facts with any accuracy has suggested other definitions.

I do not envy the Treasury its task of ascertaining the "invested capital" for the date prescribed of every trade or business in the country subject to the excess-profits tax. They may be obliged in many or most instances to accept the book accounts of corporations with respect to capital values and capital invested. Accounts having been kept very differently in the past, this condition may not only occasion loss of revenue to the Treasury, but complaint of inequalities among taxpayers. To apply "invested capital" as defined will be most difficult or impossible in many instances.

In computing net profits the income-tax provision allowing deductions of interest on indebtedness seems to govern. This provision only allows for such interest to an amount equal to its capital stock plus one-half of its indebtedness. In all cases where the capital of a business is comparatively small or where it does not exceed one-half of the indebtedness full deductions of interest will not be allowed.

Profits are computed under income-tax law, with certain modifications.

The English law originally allowed 6 per cent on capital to corporations and 7 per cent to individuals, upon the ground that the salaries of directors and officers of corporations and individuals were thereby equalized. During the present year, however, Parliament felt obliged to extend the margin in favor of individuals to 8 per cent. The rate of interest allowed on new capital was made 3 per cent additional, both as to individuals and corporations.

In determining either the capital percentage standard or the prewar average of years standard, there should be as much flexibility allowed as the statute will permit. There are many exceptional cases, both as to individual businesses and a limited number of classes of business or trade wherein the exercise of considerable latitude by the administrative officials is imperative if hardships and inequalities are to be avoided. A different profits standard is sometimes necessary. Special provisions to this and other ends should embrace cases of small capital, where the trade qualifications of those conducting the business are even more important earning factors than the capital itself, new businesses, businesses which had subnormal earnings prior to the war, businesses which have had abnormal losses, temporary businesses for war purposes, and other exceptional cases.

There may be confusion, most serious difficulties, in determining the actual value of certain intangible assets allowed in the law, such as good will, trade-marks, trade brands, and the franchise of the corporation or partnership. Trade-marks or trade names can not be distinguished from good will. They are the identifying or specialized form of good will. Again, the value of good will is measurably determined by the earning capacity of the business concern.

The English law allows deductions for all interest on indebtedness. This in chief measure disposed of the "borrowed-capital" problem. It was agreed during the discussion of their law in the House of Commons that a firm using borrowed capital should either be allowed to deduct the entire interest on it or to consider the amount borrowed as capital. Even this allowance does not place the person with borrowed capital on an equality with the person who owns his entire capital. For the purpose of dealing with this matter fairly the definition of profits should be comparable with the definition of capital, a fact which seemingly has been in a measure overlooked. We should also keep in view the proper relation between the rate of interest allowed for borrowed capital and the capital percentage rate or standard.

The laws of other Governments which impose large income and excess-profits taxes similar to ours expressly provided for the payment of the taxes by installments. The provision in our law allowing the taxpayer to discount his tax at 3 per cent in advance of the date it becomes due will not, I fear, meet the necessities of the situation. In my judgment, a provision allowing the payment by installments of a substantial portion of the estimated $2,200,000,000 of income and excess-profits taxes for this fiscal year after June, the same to bear 6 per cent interest until paid, is very necessary.

The House and Senate conferees undertook to classify businesses having no invested capital or only nominal capital along with individuals engaged in the professions and earning income from personal exertion in excess of $6,000, for the purpose of excess-profits tax, and by section 209 imposed a flat 8 per cent rate. In its very nature this is a somewhat arbitrary tax levy, conceived and adopted as the best method which would approximate the spirit and intent of the general tax provisions of the excess-profits measure. In theory the imposition of an excess-profits tax on largely increased incomes from the professions is correct and justifiable. I think, however, that an entirely different basis would be necessary in the interest of equity and relative fairness. This would best relate to the prewar earnings of the individual. Even then the question of health and other personal factors which are not found in the case of a business or trade arise. Under the present provision serious inequities and rank injustices arise as between earned and certain unearned income. In considering the incidence of the excess-profits tax more or less consideration should also be given to the effect of the income tax in its graduated form.

In explaining why professions were not embraced in the English excess-profits measure, Mr. McKenna, British chancellor of the exchequer, on December 7, 1915, said:

> I have given a great deal of time to this. I did my best to show the distinction between a profession and trade with regard to the datum line, and we know as a fact—we are not speculating now—that in professions the total amount of excess profits, if you could get a fair datum line, is extremely small, and it would not pay us to go into all the necessary complications of securing a datum line.

In making a similar explanation, Mr. Bonar Law, the present chancellor of the exchequer, on May 7, 1917, said:

> My honorable friend, the member for Leith (Mr. Currie), raised a point which I had considered long before I became chancellor of the exchequer, namely, whether or not excess-profits duty ought to apply to professions as well as to businesses. He has given the real explanation why that is not done. I think on the whole it would be fair to do it. I know two members in this house who would be affected. The honorable member who spoke last, and who told us that he was not a financier, perhaps might have found that he would have to pay something if anything of that kind came into effect; and another member who would have been affected is myself. The salary that I now get would have been excess profits, and I should have had to pay duty on it. I think that would have been perfectly fair, but after close inquiry I have come to the same conclusion as my predecessor—that in order to get revenue from the professional classes you would have to spread your net so wide and make so many assessments from which nothing would come that, as my advisers tell me, we should really not get a revenue in proportion to the expenditure.

Of course, each of these gentlemen had in mind the view of determining a basis other than the imposition of a flat percentage rate above a flat exemption of a specified amount.

Excess-profits laws generally have made no effort to tax salaries and wages. If salaries are to be so taxed, however, those of Government officials would be as properly subject to the tax as the salaries and wages of other individuals.

The great secret of the successful administration of the English excess-profits law consists in allowance of the fullest latitude with respect to all exceptional businesses and classes of business, which is vested in a board of referees. This board consists of 27 of the ablest and most experienced business men representing every important line of business activity. They divide into panels and conduct hearings and investigations in different localities at the same time, and later come together and make all computations and assessments as one body, thereby establishing uniformity. There is no appeal from their action. A board composed of men of this type would have been of great aid in administering and applying our law in the most equitable manner. Businesses and business profits could well be classified simply for the purpose of assessment, and making no distinction or discrimination as to tax rates, which rates would treat all income alike. The distinction would relate only to the manner in which the profits or income is computed and assessed. This would be in precise conformity with the English method under her income-tax law of dividing the income into five schedules, because the same income, or what is equivalent, the same standard of income, could not be computed with respect to different classes of business or sources of income, by one ironclad rule. Some modifications were necessary according to the kind of business profits to be computed and assessed.

No good purpose would now be served by a discussion of the relative merits of the different standards above which profits are measured, as contained in the various laws of other Governments. Congress has already prescribed the so-called "capital-percentage" standard in the main. I preferred a different basis. This action was taken, however, after lengthy deliberation and earnest effort on the part of those members of the Ways and Means and Finance Committees having the bill immediately in charge. I know they exerted their fullest efforts in striving to work out the most desirable standard. While laying aside any diverging views of my own, and acquiescing in their conclusions as final, I have felt justified in directing attention to certain phases of the law, at least some of which, with others not referred to, may be considered worthy of further consideration by a later session of Congress.

Under the operation of the English excess-profits law about $1,350,000,000 of excess profits were reported for taxation for 1916. If our law should sweep as clean as the English law and operate with approximate equity, the present schedule of rates would bring a much greater yield to the Treasury than $1,000,000,000, and with no general complaint of hardship. If the war should continue another year, the income and excess-profits measures should be made to yield around $3,000,000,000 for the calendar year 1918, assuming that business conditions continue to be good, as there is every ground to assume.

Space forbids the discussion of certain other important features of the new revenue measure and the further and fuller comparison of the law as a whole with what are considered the first principles of taxation. War taxation is never as equitable and scientific as normal peace taxation.

The great lesson we all must learn, and the paramount necessity we must recognize, is that this is a period of sacrifice while the war continues, involving in its outcome, as it does, our future rights, liberties, and civilization. Our brave and gallant soldier boys will do their whole duty. Every other citizen is therefore expected to contribute according to his ability with respect both to the purchase of bonds and the payment of taxes. Naturally, an injustice to a taxpayer, and even to small classes of taxpayers, may arise under the operation of temporary war-tax measures. Such condition, however, will not be due to design but will be an incident to the great general scheme for financing the Government, which can not in all cases be made strictly accurate and equitable in its detailed provisions.

Under the leadership of our great President every citizen should, and I believe will, meet the true tests of patriotism by lending his loyal cooperation to the Government in every feasible way and willingly undergoing such reasonable sacrifices as may be necessary to raise the amount of revenue from taxes and bonds that may be necessary to bring the war to an early and favorable conclusion.

Conscription.

OF
HON. JOHN R. FARR,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

"Some of the Work of the Extra Session."

OF

HON. J. CHARLES LINTHICUM,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, the present extraordinary session of Congress, called in April by the President of the United States, has been marked by a greater volume of legislation and the enactment of measures of more momentous import than have ever been considered in any similar period in the parliamentary history of any country. Any criticism, therefore, that has been leveled at the Senate and House growing out of the impatience to place the country upon a war basis at the earliest possible moment in my judgment is unfair and indicates a lack of appreciation or knowledge of the enormous amount of work which the two Houses have performed.

The session included 188 days, including Sundays and holidays. Responsibilities of momentous character and long duration have been carefully, intelligently, and wisely assumed by the membership of the Congress, and on each measure, large and small, they have, with characteristic thoroughness done those things which are calculated to redound to the interest of the citizens of our country.

The important measures enacted into law at this Congress are as follows:

1. Public resolution No. 1, declaring a state of war exists between the Imperial German Government and the Government and the people of the United States and making provision to prosecute the same. On April 2 the German war resolution was introduced in the House, and on April 6, or four days after the assembling of Congress, the President attached his signature to that measure. No delay was involved in the passage of this resolution, perhaps the most important ever offered, either in this or any other Congress.

2. Public act No. 1, appropriating $68,020 for certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress.

3. Public act No. 2, general deficiency appropriation act, appropriating $163,841,400.52, of which $100,000,000 was for the national security and defense and for each and every purpose connected with the war.

4. Public act No. 3, authorizing an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes. This act appropriates $3,007,063,945.46 for establishing credits in the United States for foreign governments by purchase of bonds of our allies and expenses incident to preparation and issue of bonds and certificates; authorizes the issue of bonds amounting to $5,063,945,460, of which $3,000,000,000 is for meeting the loans authorized to foreign governments, $2,000,000,000 to meet domestic expenditures, and $63,945,460 to redeem the 3 per cent loan of 1908 to 1918, maturing August 1, 1918; and also authorizes $2,000,000,000 of one-year certificates of indebtedness temporarily to provide revenue.

5. Public act No. 7, authorizing one additional midshipman for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress.

6. Public act No. 11, appropriating $273,046,322.50 for the support of the Army for the fiscal year 1918.

7. Public act No. 12, authorizing the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States. This act authorized a selective draft of 1,000,000 men and contains other important legislative features pertaining to the Army.

8. Public resolution No. 2, authorizing the President to take over for the United States any vessel owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war.

9. Public resolution No. 3, authorizing the American Red Cross to erect certain temporary buildings in Washington, D. C.

10. Public act No. 17, to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps from 87,000 to 150,000 men, in the first instance, and from 17,400 to 30,000 in the second.

11. Public act No. 18, appropriating $1,344,896.18 for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year 1918, and for other purposes.

12. Public act No. 19, amending an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, in respect of car service, and for other purposes.

13. Public act No. 20, amending the war-risk insurance act and appropriating $45,150,000 to insure vessels and their cargoes, and expenses connected therewith.

14. Public act No. 21, appropriating $147,363,928.77 for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year 1918.

15. Public act No. 22, authorizing the issue to States and Territories and the District of Columbia of rifles and other property for the equipment of organizations of home guards.

16. Public act No. 23, appropriating $3,281,094,541.60 for the Military and Naval Establishments on account of war expenses. Up to this time this is the largest appropriation act known to this or any other country. Among other things, it appropriates $405,000,000 for an emergency shipping fund with which to begin construction of the greatest merchant fleet the world has ever known.

17. Public act No. 24, to punish acts of interference with foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

18. Public act No. 25, amending the Federal reserve act.

19. Public act No. 26, authorizing condemnation proceedings of lands for military purposes.

20. Public act No. 29, appropriating $640,000,000 to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships.

21. Public act No. 31, authorizing the United States to take possession of a site for use for permanent aviation stations of the Army and Navy for school purposes.

22. Public act No. 37, appropriating $27,826,150 for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors.

23. Public acts Nos. 38 and 39, enlarging the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission and amending the act to regulate commerce, by authorizing priority shipments by any common carrier, etc.

24. Public act No. 40, appropriating $11,346,400 to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

25. Public act No. 41, appropriating $162,500,000 to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

26. Public act No. 43, to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes. This act makes an additional appropriation of $4,021,377,890.92 to extend credit in the United States for foreign governments by purchase of bonds of our allies and expenses incident to preparation of an issue of bonds and certificates; authorizes an additional issue of $4,000,000,000 of bonds to meet loans to foreign governments; authorizes an additional issue of one-year certificates of indebtedness amounting to $2,000,000,000 and an issue of five-year war-saving certificates amounting to $2,000,000,000.

27. Public act No. 45, authorizing the construction of a building for the use of the Treasury Department in Washington, D. C., at a total cost not exceeding $1,250,000.

28. Public act appropriating $5,356,666,016.93 to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1918 and prior years on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, and authorizes contract obligations to be met by future Congresses amounting to $2,401,458,393.50. This is the largest appropriation act passed by this or any other country. This act makes further appropriations for the emergency shipping fund of $635,000,000 and raises the limit of cost to carry out the purposes of the shipping act to $1,734,000,000.

29. Public act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes, and appropriates $450,000 to enforce the provisions thereof.

30. Public act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes. This measure provides approximately $2,500,000,000 of revenue with which to pay the expenses of the Government.

31. Public act to provide a military and naval family allowance, compensation, and insurance fund for the benefit of soldiers and sailors and their families, and makes an appropriation therefor of $176,250,000.

This record of achievement speaks for itself.

PROVING GROUND.

There was one thing which sprung up, causing a great deal of thought and naturally much controversy; that was the location of the proving ground for the War Department. Many persons were of the opinion that this important adjunct of the War Department should be located on what is known as Kent Island, in the Chesapeake Bay, opposite the mouth of the Severn, which river leads to Annapolis.

There were various opinions as to whether or not this location was a proper one for the proving ground. It was shown that the site was located within 6 miles of the city of Annapolis, 20 miles from Baltimore, and in the narrowest part of the Chesapeake Bay, between which island and the western shore of Maryland there was but 4 miles. It was shown that all the shipping to and from Baltimore, which has grown to vast proportions, had to pass within 2 miles of the island, and likewise the shipping through what is known as the inland waterway, which is the trunk-line waterway the Government is gradually establishing from Boston to Key West.

Many persons, and not without very grave reasons, were of the opinion that the explosion of some 6,000 shells from guns of various caliber per day on this island would menace the shipping so near at hand. The War Department officials were quoted as saying that such would not be the case, but nevertheless the very thought of having such explosions within close proximity to shipping and so close to the city of Annapolis was at least a handicap and an element of danger in the opinion of many.

It has been stated that the proving ground at Sandy Hook does not in anywise interfere with the shipping at that point, but it must be borne in mind, of course, that there are to be more explosions and tests in one day at the proving ground to be established here than occurred at Sandy Hook in a year.

I find in the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, which committee was named by the Secretary of War to be the arbitrators as to whether or not Kent Island should be taken, that Gen. Crozier said the Chesapeake Bay, being an inland waterway, has not anything like the traffic that the ocean has in the vicinity of Sandy Hook, and that there is not the danger of interruption nor the same difficulty in seeing to interfere with the testing of guns, ammunition, and so forth. This statement was controverted by those opposing the taking of Kent Island by showing that the ship channel from Baltimore, and naturally from the inland waterway now being established, was less than 2 miles from Kent Island.

I have no doubt, if Gen. Crozier says this and is familiar with the traffic on the Chesapeake Bay, that what he says is correct, but we must bear in mind that this proving ground is not established for a day nor for a year, but it is to become a permanent establishment for a country now at war and one which will no doubt continue to be active and prepared for any emergency which may arise in the years to come. There will perhaps never be a time when so few guns are tested and so little transpiring in the War and Navy Departments as has been in the past.

BALTIMORE'S COMMERCE.

Let us remember that the exports of grain alone from the city of Baltimore to the countries of the world has increased from 41,000,000 bushels in 1896 to 120,000,000 in 1916, more than doubling that shipped from Philadelphia, and within 50,000,000 bushels of that shipped from the great city of New York. We also find that there entered the port of Baltimore from foreign ports in 1916 more than 1,129 steamships, 7 big sailing ships, 48 barks, and 12 schooners, a total of 1,196, showing a total tonnage of 2,584,589 tons, and that there cleared for coastwise trading some 1,800 vessels carrying a total tonnage of 3,000,000 tons. All these vessels, of course, likewise left the port, and it is necessary to double this great number of steamships and vessels of various nature in order to ascertain the number of trips made past Kent Island along the ship channel and within two miles of the site suggested for the proving ground, which aggregate some 6,000 trips per year. Then this number does not take into account the number of excursion boats nor small boats which do merely a local business in the Chesapeake Bay and in the vicinity of Kent Island.

When we realize that there is an immense amount of shipping along this channel, embracing, as it does, not only foreign shipping from Baltimore but the growing transport business along the Inland Waterway from Boston to Key West and the immense coastwise shipping of Baltimore to the harbors of the Atlantic seaboard and to the numerous rivers to and from which the boats from Baltimore ply we can readily see the immense shipping along Kent Island and the necessity for protecting same.

It was stated by Col. Ruggles that the island was an isolated place, but it was also stated that the place outlined for firing the long-range guns runs directly across the mouth of the Patapsco River and directly across the line of boats which make daily trips to and from Baltimore.

"QUESTION OF DEPOPULATION NOT ALONE CONSIDERED."

The taking of Kent Island was opposed by many because it would dispossess some 3,000 people from their homes and that it would remove from the productive field some 17,000 acres of good arable land which is now producing much food. This view, however, did not enter the minds of all those opposed to the taking of the island, because it was realized by these that no matter where the proving ground was located some people and perhaps many people would be dispossessed, and besides it was realized that even giving up an old established home held for generations was not comparable with the giving up by the mothers and fathers of their boys to enter the Army in the defense of liberty and their daughters to enter Red Cross work to take care of those fighting for their flag and country.

COULD BE ESTABLISHED ELSEWHERE.

It was believed that the proving ground could be established at some point along the Chesapeake Bay which would be just as advantageous as the officials had claimed Kent Island would be, and yet would not interfere with the shipping along the channel to Baltimore and the inland waterway, nor be dangerous to the lives and property of those traveling along the Chesapeake Bay.

LARGE SENTIMENT OPPOSED.

That there was a very large sentiment opposed to the taking of Kent Island can readily be seen when we realize that the Committee on Appropriations, which reported the item of $3,000,000 for the purpose of purchasing the proving ground voted only 7 to 5 in favor of the item allowing the taking of Kent Island and that the chairman of that important committee did not vote. Further, that when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] moved to strike out the item, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee did not in anywise oppose the point of order and took no active part in the discussion.

In addition to this, while we have the highest regard for the Appropriations Committee, it must be remembered that the committee is not infallible in its actions, because if we will recollect this very committee, not more than a year ago, reported the proposition to eliminate the Subtreasury at Baltimore, while it allowed the continuance of those at other cities in the country. It was only after strenuous and hard work on behalf of the citizens of Baltimore in meeting assembled, and the active cooperation of the Members of Congress from Maryland that we were able to defeat the proposition and to retain for Baltimore this very important financial institution.

In addition to this it must also be remembered that countless Members of the House, not on the Appropriations Committee, when asked their views upon the taking of Kent Island, were unalterably opposed to the proposition, and that the Senate of the United States was almost a unit in its opposition. As a culminating and most conclusive proof that it was wrong to do so, the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, to whom I have said the question as to whether or not Kent Island should be taken was submitted by the Secretary of War to act as arbitrators, unanimously decided, after hearing both the Secretary of War and other officials of the department, that it would be wrong to convert that beautiful island into a proving ground.

ANNAPOLIS EXPERIMENTAL STATION.

The statement has also been made upon very strong, expert authority that had Kent Island been selected for the proving ground, the experimental station, which we all hope to procure for Annapolis, could not have been located there in such close proximity to the tremendous concussions going on throughout the entire length of the day at Kent Island.

HARFORD COUNTY SITE.

The question was finally decided by the War Department selecting another site on the Chesapeake Bay in Harford County, taking in Gunpowder Neck and other territory contiguous thereto. Some continue to believe that Kent Island would have been a better location. The location finally selected gives the War Department not only deep water to the proving ground but also two great trunk line railroads, extending from all sections of the South and into all sections of the North, so that shells can be conveyed from the various munition plants without transshipment to boat and can be loaded at that point for all sections of the world.

BALTIMORE'S PROGRESS.

Baltimore is making rapid progress not alone in its local business, but in establishing business relations with world ports. While there is not a Congressman who would for a moment deter the War Department in carrying to a successful determination the great conflict in which we are now engaged, it has been the aim and object of each and everyone to see that this conflict is carried on with as little hardship to any section of the country as possible. It has been considered by all who are familiar with the situation that the proving ground located as it now will be, at the head of the Chesapeake Bay not infringing upon shipping nor injurious to any person is a very satisfactory outcome of a controversy which waged so long and at the same time affords the Government just as good location.

CHESAPEAKE BAY ACTIVITIES.

I have long been of the opinion that the Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries must ere long become the center of the activities of the War and Navy Departments of our Government. With its magnificent harbors, its close proximity to the seat of our Government, its equable climate and freedom from storms of any severity make it especially attractive for the great works of the Government.

I feel that this long-cherished hope is fast becoming a reality from the fact that we will now have located upon same not only the proving ground at the head of the bay, but a great war depot near the city of Baltimore, many shipbuilding plants along our rivers, a branch of the Quartermaster's Department in Baltimore City, the great cantonment at Camp Meade, and other activities which are necessary for the conduct of the war, and which it will be necessary for us to continue in order to be protected and prepared for any emergency which may arise in future years.

BALTIMORE HARBOR.

That Baltimore will be able to take care of this great influx of business, more abundant than ever in the past, is well understood when we consider that Congress, through a bill which I introduced some time ago, has adopted the plans for the widening and deepening of Baltimore Harbor and the expenditure thereon of some $785,000. This, together with the appropriations which have heretofore been obtained for York Spit Channel of $326,000 and the $550,000 which was granted for the construction of the most modern immigration station in the country, shows that while Baltimore, in this stress of time and great war preparations and activities in every direction, has not overlooked the importance and necessity of enlargement. Baltimore seems to have come into its own and prosperity and progress abound on every hand. The prophecy of the Chief Engineer of the War Department, located at Baltimore several years ago, when he said that Baltimore would ere long become the chief seaport of the Atlantic seaboard, second alone to New York, seems near at hand.

I am proud that our city has lived up to its reputation; that our city has complied with its every contract in reference to the great cantonment at Camp Meade; that our people have enlisted in the Army and Navy, making up the entire quota demanded of them, and that they have subscribed to the liberty bonds and performed their every duty to the National Government during these perilous times. I am proud, likewise, of the women of our State, who are doing everything possible to carry us successfully through this great siege and to bring us out with Old Glory still waving on high—the Stars and Stripes, which have never bowed their colors in defeat.

"Tis the Star-Spangled Banner; oh, long may it wave,
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

OF
HON. JOHN R. FARR,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following petitions:

The Hon. JOHN R. FARR,
The Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned appeals to you to have an exchange of personal family news, duly censored, arranged between people living in the United States and our motherland, Hungary.

Many among us have not heard from their closest relatives for nearly three years. Many among us don't know whether their relatives are living or dead. Shall parents or children, wife and husband, brother and sister, be left entirely without news of one another for years?

The exchange could be arranged through a special office to be established in New York City for the censoring and rewriting of family messages, and for forwarding same United States embassy bags to our representatives in Switzerland, Sweden, and Holland for transmission through a neutral embassy to the embassies of Austria-Hungary. Our State Department could easily arrange for this humanitarian work. The expenses connected with it could be covered by imposing double or triple postal charges.

Our Government communicates with the central powers regarding many subjects through the medium of neutral countries. Why should not citizens receive censored family news?

Please cooperate in such ways as you can in this worthy work, and at least urge the State Department to help relieve thousands of anxious hearts.

Respectfully, yours, JOHN SENINK.

REMARKS
HON. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, OF NEVADA,
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Thursday, August 2, 1917.

The Senate had under consideration the conference report on the river and harbor bill, confirming the following Senate amendment:

SEC. 18. That a commission, to be known as the Waterways Commission, consisting of seven members to be appointed by the President of the United States, at least one of whom shall be chosen from the active or retired list of the Engineers Corps of the Army, at least one of whom shall be an exact hydraulic engineer from civil life, and the remaining five of whom may each be selected either from civil life or the public service, is hereby created and authorized, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, and subject to the approval of the heads of the several executive departments concerned, to bring into coordination and cooperation the engineering, scientific, and constructive services, bureaus, boards, and commissions of the several governmental departments of the United States and commissions created by Congress that relate to study, development, or control of waterways and water resources and subjects related thereto, or to the development and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, with a view to uniting such services in investigating, with respect to all watersheds in the United States, questions relating to the development, improvement, regulation, and control of navigation as a part of interstate and foreign commerce, including therein the related questions of irrigation, drainage, forestry, arid and swamp land reclamation, clarification of streams, regulation of flow, control of floods, utilization of water power, prevention of soil erosion and waste, storage and conservation of water for agricultural, industrial, municipal, and domestic uses, cooperation of railways and waterways, and promotion of terminal and transfer facilities, to secure the necessary data, and to formulate and report to Congress, as early as practicable, a comprehensive plan or plans for the development of waterways and the water resources of the United States for the purposes of navigation and for every useful purpose, and recommendations for the modification or discontinuance of any project herein or heretofore adopted. Any member appointed from the retired list shall receive the same pay and allowances as he would if on the active list, and no member selected from the public service shall receive additional compensation for services on said commission, and members selected from civil life shall receive compensation of $7,500 per annum.

In all matters done, or to be done, under this section relating to any of the subjects, investigations, or questions to be considered hereunder, and in formulating plans, and in the preparation of a report or reports, as herein provided, consideration shall be given to all matters which are to be undertaken, either independently by the United States or by cooperation between the United States and the several States, political subdivisions thereof, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals within the jurisdiction, powers, and rights of each, respectively, and with a view to assigning to the United States such portion of such development, promotion, regulation, and control as may be undertaken by the United States, and to the States, political subdivisions thereof, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals such portions as belong to their respective jurisdictions, rights and interests.

The commission is authorized to employ, or retain, and fix the compensation for the services of such engineers, transportation experts, experts in water development and utilization, and constructors of eminence as it may deem necessary to make such investigations and to carry out the purposes of this section. And in order to defray the expenses made necessary by the provisions of this section there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as Congress may hereafter determine, and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, available until expended, to be paid out upon warrants drawn on the Secretary of the Treasury by the chairman of said commission.

The commission shall have power to make every expenditure requisite for and incident to its authorized work, and to employ in the District of Columbia and in the field such clerical, legal, engineering, artistic, and expert services as it may deem advisable, including the payment of per diem in lieu of subsistence for employees engaged in field work or traveling on official business, rent of offices in the District of Columbia and in the field, and the purchase of books, maps, and office equipment.

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to delay, prevent, or interfere with the completion of any survey, investigation, project, or work herein or heretofore or hereafter adopted or authorized upon or for the improvement of any of the rivers or harbors of the United States or with legislative action upon reports heretofore or hereafter presented.

Approved, August 8, 1917.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] as to the importance of bringing the rail and water carriers into coordination and cooperation. I wish, however, to call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to the fact that, desirable as the cooperation and coordination of rail and water carriers is, we must have a perfected instrumentality for rail carriers and must have a perfected instrumentality for water carriers; and a complete and perfect waterway is as essential for water carriage as a complete and perfect railway for rail carriage.

THE RHINE AND THE DANUBE.

We have been singularly lethargic in our movement for the perfection of our waterways. The newspapers announce that, even during the stress of war, Germany and Austria have agreed upon a plan, and are now engaged in its actual execution, of connecting the headwaters of the Rhine, which empties into the North Sea, with the headwaters of the Danube, emptying into the Black Sea. When that is done, we shall find, as the result, that the perfectly coordinated system of waterways of Germany—uniting all her waterways by artificial connection in such a way that you can proceed from one part of Germany to any other part of Germany by waterway—will be united with an equally perfected system of waterways in Austria. When this war ends that great union of coordinated empires will have the most perfect system of rail, river, and ocean transportation in the world.

COORDINATED RAIL AND RIVER TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. President, I wish to add something further to what the Senator from Minnesota has said. He has suggested that, as chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, I should apply my energies to bring the rail and waterway carriers into coordination. I wish to say that that matter has received my most earnest attention, and is now before the Joint Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate and the House of Representatives, of which I have the honor to be chairman, and which is considering the whole question of waterway transportation. If the Senator will read the reports of the hearings held by that joint committee, he will find how large a space is devoted to the consideration of a perfected waterway system, with a view of bringing rail carriers, river carriers, and ocean carriers into coordination.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to express my great gratification that the amendment of the Senate providing for a waterways commission has been accepted by the House conferees.

THE RIVER REGULATION BILL.

This amendment embodies the substantial features of a measure known as the river regulation bill, which some of us have been urging for years for the practical coordination of the engineering and scientific services of the country engaged in the study of our water resources in order that those resources may be fully utilized for navigation, irrigation, swamp and arid land reclamation, water-power development, and all other useful purposes for which the surplus waters that are now wasted may be beneficially used, and for the coordination of the Nation with the States in plans and works for the full development from the source to the mouth of all waterways in such a way as to eliminate destructive floods and to utilize flood and stored waters for beneficial and wealth-producing purposes.

Such legislation was approved nearly 10 years ago by the Inland Waterways Commission appointed by Mr. Roosevelt, and has been supported by Mr. Roosevelt and by Mr. Taft, as well as by President Wilson and his Cabinet. Whilst the provision in the river and harbor bill does not carry the large appropriations contemplated in the original bill introduced by me and urged for so many years, it does provide for its entire plan of organization and administrative machinery, and under it plans for construction can be perfected and submitted for the approval of Congress.

I predict that the passage of this measure will open up a new era in transportation and that under it a perfectly coordinated system of rail, river, and ocean transportation will be developed. I predict also that destructive floods will be mitigated and eventually eliminated; that swamp lands will be restored; that arid lands will be reclaimed; that intensive cultivation and forestry will be stimulated by supplies of stored water; that water power will be developed for municipal and power uses; and that under its provisions a remarkable conservation of the natural resources of the country will be established.

No one can picture the beauty and perfection of our waterway system when our river banks can be made stable, when the channels become fixed and the flood plane determined and controlled, and when thriving towns and cities will be established at places which have been for years threatened with constantly rising floods and recurring overflows.

WATER CONSERVATION A WAR MEASURE.

As a war measure nothing surpasses in importance this measure. Our rivers, connected with each other by artificial channels, and with the Great Lakes, and with the gulfs and oceans, will carry the cheap and bulky articles of freight which are now burdening our railroads to the point of congestion.

We must not overlook the fact that the war is enormously stimulating industry along lines that are largely temporary. Peace will bring far-reaching stagnation, unless some great constructive policy for building internal improvements is substituted for the stimulus to industry created by the war, which will be withdrawn when peace returns. The plans for such a great national constructive era for internal improvement and development can now be made before the war closes. The instant peace has been achieved this Nation can turn the same indomitable energy that it is now devoting to winning this war against a foreign foe to winning a greater war against the destroying forces of nature, and to the creation of new wealth, by building waterways, by creating new communities on reclaimed lands, by developing water power, by controlling floods, by planting forests, by preventing forest fires, and by conserving for the best and highest use, for the benefit of all the people, the natural resources of the country.

The greatest waste that takes place in this country to-day is the waste of its surplus waters, which are the Nation's greatest asset, but which now run to waste in the sea, carrying destruction in their path in the form of devastating floods. We must learn to conserve that waste and to transform it into wealth—we must learn to fight that devastation with exactly the same all-conquering energy that we are now devoting to war. In no other way can the period of industrial depression that will otherwise be the aftermath of the war be so effectually averted. If that is to be done the great work of making the working plans for construction must be done before the war ends. It must be begun now and prosecuted with the same diligence that war measures are being prosecuted. This great work of building internal improvements and creating densely settled rural communities on newly reclaimed lands and on old lands protected from overflow or fortified by an abundant water supply, will furnish a way of providing for the industrial employment of the hundreds of thousands of men who will return from the war when it has closed and their terms of enlistment have expired, and for whom occupation must be provided in time of peace.

We can not ever expect to maintain a large army in idleness in this country in time of peace, but we can maintain an industrial army. The pressure of the strenuous economic competition that will prevail in the world after the war will not permit the economic waste of a large army of idlers. If we have an army it will have to be a working army, engaged in the construction of works of internal improvement, such as are contemplated in this provision for river regulation which is embodied in the river and harbor bill.

In the economic era that lies ahead, that nation which applies the greatest science and skill in the elimination of waste, in the conservation of natural resources, and in the development of opportunity, will fare best in material progress, in the creation of national strength and wealth, and in the progressive development of world influence. This river-regulation provision opens the gate wide for us.

A CONSTRUCTIVE EXECUTIVE.

Mr. President, the agitation which has finally resulted in the adoption of this measure has been going on for more than 10 years; very many have contributed most materially to its advancement; waterways associations and chambers of commerce and boards of trade throughout the country have had their attention directed to this movement and have approved it, and many eminent, energetic, and public-spirited men have contributed to its advancement. I wish to say, however, that my experience in Congress has been that it is very difficult for an individual Member of Congress to initiate and carry through within a reasonable period any great constructive work of legislation. It took 10 years to carry through the reclamation act, and then we had to summon to our support the matchless energy of Theodore Roosevelt, without whose aid the passage of that bill would probably have been much longer delayed. It is absolutely essential that there be a constructive Executive to focus the attention of the country and of Congress upon a particular constructive measure. So it was in reference to the Trade Commission, a measure which had been pending here for years, and which needed the energizing force of President Wilson to carry it into accomplishment. So it is with this measure. Every friend of waterway development is indebted to Mr. Wilson for the painstaking attention which he has given to this subject. He appointed a Cabinet committee to investigate it and to make a report to him; and ever since that time he has been the firm and consistent friend of a great, comprehensive measure for the development of our waterways and the conservation and utilization of our water resources.

THE PROPAGANDA.

I can not in this connection close in reference to those who outside of Congress have been active in this movement without referring to Mr. George H. Maxwell, the executive director of the National Reclamation Association, who is so prominently identified with the national reclamation movement, who conducted the educational propaganda throughout the country for 10 years which finally led to putting the National Reclamation Act upon the statute books; who, ever since then, has been continuously connected with the Nation-wide educational propaganda for the passage of this measure, and who, as the trusted adviser of the Flood Commission of Pittsburgh and of the Reclamation Association of Louisiana, gave his ripe experience to the subject of conducting this great propaganda, and the prosecution of the work of those organizations. In connection with that work he lived for nearly three years in Pittsburgh, from 1908 to 1911, studying the flood problems of the Ohio River Valley, and during 1912 and 1913, the two great flood years, he was in New Orleans, studying the flood and waterway problems of the Mississippi River Valley.

Mr. President, I would be glad to mention other names, among them the names of Frederick H. Newell; Gifford Pinchot; the late W. J. McGee; Herbert Knox Smith; Walter Parker, of New Orleans; Robert N. Downman, of New Orleans; Joseph N. Teal, of Oregon; the late Charles B. Boothe, of Los Angeles, for many years president of the National Reclamation Association; William E. Smythe, of San Francisco, the founder of the National Irrigation Congress; Francis Cuttle, of Riverside, chairman of the Tri-Counties Reforestation Committee; J. L. Craig and G. McM. Ross, of Stockton, Cal.; Gov. Hall, of Louisiana; Gov. Capper and J. B. Case, of Kansas; and Herbert Quick, of the Federal Farm Loan Board.

The General Federation of Women's Clubs of the United States, through its present chairman of conservation, Mrs. John Dickinson Sherman, and her predecessor, Mrs. Emmons Crocker, have been unfaltering in their support of this measure, which is equally true of innumerable State and local women's clubs, under the leadership of such loyal adherents as the late Miss Hattie M. Carstens and Mrs. B. F. Williston, of Detroit; Mrs. Foster Elliot, of Los Angeles; Mrs. Roydan Douglas, of New Orleans; and many others who ought to be mentioned. In fact, there is hardly a State in the Union which has not furnished its quota of zealous advocates of this plan for river regulation which is embodied in the measure now before the Senate. Their name is legion, and the mention of a few involves no lack of appreciation of the faithful work of the many who are entitled to recognition.

In this connection, Mr. President, I ask leave to insert a historical statement of this measure containing extracts from the messages of various Presidents, extracts from reports of committees, and other public matter, both in newspapers and in the public records, as well as letters relating to this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection.

TOPEKA, KANS., April 5, 1917.

Hon. FRANCIS M. NEWLANDS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I thought you might be interested in the inclosed letter, which I have received from J. B. Case, of Abilene. You probably know Mr. Case. He is one of our finest citizens and a great booster for your bill. I think he is right in his views.

With best regards, I am,
Very respectfully,

ARTHUR CAPPER.

FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST CO.,
Kansas City, Mo., April 3, 1917.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
Topeka, Kans.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I inclose a clipping of the Star of this date, which goes to show how slow and careless the people of the United States perform and also goes to show the great projects that Senator NEWLANDS has figured out in the interest of the West; I say West—in interest of the whole country; but it looks to me as though it were up to the West to push this matter of the Newlands bill harder than we ever have before.

It also goes to show that with Germany's great war and expense that the present indications of war in the United States should be no reason why this Government should not take up the Newlands project with the sum of $600,000,000 in comparison with the $163,000,000 which Germany has already appropriated for a like construction.

I have recently been drafted by this company as its president, but do not think I will change my residence, as I expect to spend part of my time in Abilene, as usual.

Yours, truly,

J. B. CASE, President.

[From Kansas City Star, Apr. 5, 1917.]

GERMANY PLANS A NEW SHIP CANAL.

In the midst of war Germany is planning vast industrial developments and internal improvements to be carried out after peace comes. One of the most gigantic of these has in it a lesson for Americans, and especially for those of the Middle West. It is a ship canal 440 miles long, 120 feet wide, and 11 feet deep, capable of floating vessels of 1,200 tons, to connect the Main and the Danube Rivers. It will cost $163,000,000 and will require eight years to build. The Bavarian Government has already made arrangements to raise its share of the cost.

By following the course of this canal on a map of Germany an idea of its importance may be had. The River Main is to be deepened from its confluence with the Rhine at Mainz to Nuremberg. From there the canal will go south to the Danube. When this work is finished boats from the North Sea may enter the Rhine, go up to Mainz and enter the Main and so on to the Danube and down that river to the Black Sea.

Why is Germany going to spend such a vast sum on an internal waterway? The answer contains the lesson from which America may profit. Mainly this work is to be done to relieve railway congestion. Germany's plans for great industrial development can not be carried out if the railways are to become congested with freight and traffic delayed. Experience has shown that in times of great activity the railroads are not adequate to handle the traffic. Germany has had that experience, just as we had it this year, and many times before. Germany, with an already widely developed system of waterways, has learnt how waterborne traffic relieves railway congestion. Between 1895 and 1905 the traffic on German waterways increased 125 per cent, and on railways it increased 71 per cent. The two systems work together, the waterways taking the poorest paying heavy merchandise, such as coal, sand, lumber, hardware, leaving the railways free for passengers and fast freight.

America's waterways are undeveloped. In time they will all be great arteries of transportation and then we shall not have the whole railway transportation system of this country stalled because of congestion from trains of coal and wheat and lumber and iron ore moving slowly on every line. Those commodities will go by water, as they do in Germany. If the United States is to keep up with Germany in the race for the world's trade we must plan for as great efficiency as Germany has, and one of the things contributing to that efficiency is water-borne transportation.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 18, 1917.

Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
United States Senate, Washington.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You and I have been interested for years in the matter of the development of our inland waterways. You may possibly remember my book, American Inland Waterways, published in 1909 by Putnam.

For some years I have refused to take any interest in the matter of this development because of the conviction which has been borne in upon me that all plans for restoring commerce to our rivers will be futile, save under exceptional conditions, until a national policy is adopted which will require the railroads to correlate their business with the business of the waterways; will prevent them from pursuing policies which are destructive to waterway commerce; will enable shippers to route their shipments by land or water, in whole or in part, according to their needs; which will force joint traffic arrangements between water lines and railway lines; and which will build up our inland harbors with freight-handling appliances and means generally for putting the waterway transportation lines as nearly upon an equality with railway lines in the matter of service as is possible.

I am taking the liberty to address this letter to you at this time because of the fact that the railroads are, in my opinion, absolutely sure to break down completely under the load of freight which they will have to carry during this war.

We are urging the farmers to produce and produce, and to continue to produce, but we are providing no additional transportation of any sort for them. The slow, heavy freight not only ought to go by water where possible, but additional possibilities for its movements ought to be opened up, and the railroads should be, if necessary, coerced into allowing that sort of freight to come by water instead of breaking their backs trying to carry it by rail.

I certainly doubt whether complete development of the interior of a country like this can ever take place except by the development of our waterways.

Under the present conditions of the American railways prosperity can develop only up to a certain point. When this point is reached, prosperity is strangled by lack of transportation. This condition is intolerable, to my mind, and within six months I feel sure that it will be so regarded by all minds.

Whatever is necessary to be done in the way of legislation or constitutional amendments ought now to be done, in order that we may adopt a national waterways policy which will include not only reforestation to prevent the silting up of our waterways, but also headwaters control, a system of reservoirs on the general principles advocated by Mr. Marshall O. Leighton in 1907, and the development of the water powers which will be made available by such a system. At present the constitutional doctrine that nothing can be done in these matters except in the interests of navigation makes all coordinated effort in that direction difficult. May I suggest that now is the time for a "spring drive" in the direction of waterway development. I do not for a moment believe that you are oblivious of the fact that the present crisis is an opportunity, and I am writing this to express my belief that the breakdown of transportation which is now apparent will soon make transportation one of our big issues.

There are no cars for coal. The Packard Co. are delivering their automobiles all over the United States, even as far as the Pacific coast, by having them driven overland on account of lack of cars. I am told that in the city of Flint, Mich., there are from 15,000 to 20,000 automobiles parked in open places of the city for lack of storage room, every one of which has been sold to a customer but can not be delivered for want of cars. What will happen under the pressure of war and war orders and the movement of troops is something which the country and its legislators have not yet realized.

Please pardon this long letter, which I will not make longer unnecessarily.

Yours, sincerely, HERBERT QUICK,
Member Farm Loan Board.

HISTORICAL STATEMENT REGARDING THE WATERWAY MOVEMENT.

THE NEWLANDS RIVER REGULATION AMENDMENT: SECTION 18 OF THE RIVER AND HARBOR BILL OF 1917.

[By George H. Maxwell, executive director National Reclamation Association.]

A historical statement of the national campaign that has led up to the final adoption of the great comprehensive plan for river regulation provided for in section 18 of the river and harbor bill for 1917, known as the Newlands River Regulation Amendment, in place of the old and hopelessly inadequate, piecemeal system of river improvement is a most interesting chapter in the legislative history of the United States.

The river-regulation movement harks back to the very beginning of the agitation for national irrigation and water conservation in the West—even farther back than the founding of the National Irrigation Congress by William E. Smythe, more than a quarter of a century ago. Many of the early pioneers in the movement, like Maj. J. W. Powell, did not live to see the realization of their visions, but we are now within reach of that realization.

River regulation—the control of the surplus flow and flood waters on the source streams by systems of reservoirs—was the original idea of this movement when it first took the form of a nation-wide campaign.

The Newlands Reclamation Act, passed in 1902, was a compromise and provided only for the reclamation of specific tracts of land where the cost of the reclamation could be reimbursed from the lands reclaimed. It was not a complete adoption of the comprehensive national policy which had been theretofore urged upon Congress, the policy of regulating the flow of all rivers by reservoirs so as to increase the water resources of the Nation, without reference to any specific use of the water or any particular tract of land any more than has been the policy in other river improvements under the river and harbor bills.

The Newlands Reclamation Act was only a stepping stone to the more comprehensive river-regulation policy, which included in its scope the full conservation and utilization of all the vast unused and now wasted water resources of the United States, not only for navigation but for every beneficial purpose for which the water could be used.

Immediately following the inauguration of the new national policy provided for by the Newlands Reclamation Act the advocates of a nation-wide policy of river regulation returned to their active efforts to secure the inauguration by Congress of the whole broad river-regulation policy, and those efforts have at last culminated in its adoption through the enactment of this Newlands river-regulation amendment.

The most interesting and complete historical statement heretofore published with reference to this movement is found in the report of the Flood Commission of Pittsburgh, pages 1 to 5, from which the following is quoted:

"HISTORICAL.

"The regulation and control of the flow of navigable rivers in aid of interstate commerce is an important factor relating to the conservation, development, and use of the natural resources of the United States and the enlargement of its internal trade and commerce. When such a national policy has been adopted on a scale commensurate with the magnitude of the problem, it will not only promote navigation and water transportation but must also necessarily include the storage of flood waters for flood prevention and for all other beneficial uses and the protection of watersheds from denudation and erosion and from forest fires.

"Much has already been done, in a disconnected and inadequate way, toward the inauguration of such a comprehensive national policy for river regulation, and the work done and measures advocated by the Flood Commission of Pittsburgh are in the direction of an ultimate enlargement of that policy, which will be vastly beneficial to the entire country. The progress thus far made has been accomplished as the result of three organized movements:

"First. The national irrigation movement, culminating in the passage of the national irrigation act, which became a law on June 2, 1902. Under this act about $60,000,000 has been thus far expended in the construction of works for water storage and control in the western half of the United States. Several large reservoirs have been built on the headwaters of the Missouri River and its tributaries.

"Second. The Appalachian Forest Reserve movement, resulting in the passage of the Weeks Appalachian National Forest Act, which became a law on March 1, 1911. The purpose of this act, as expressed in its title, is 'to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers.'

"Third. The national storage-reservoir movement, which was first in order of date and was inaugurated by the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh through the National Board of Trade in December, 1898. The resolution then presented by the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce to the National Board of Trade urged 'the storage of flood waters on the upper branches of navigable streams, to be held in use for irrigation, for checking damaging floods and liberating water in times of drought that will preserve streams in navigable condition.'

"In behalf of this proposition Mr. George H. Anderson, then secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, submitted a report, the preamble of which was as follows:

"Your committee, to whom has been referred the subject of the storage of flood waters on the higher tributaries of the navigable streams in the Mississippi and Ohio Valleys for improving navigation, providing for irrigation. etc., present the following report:

"After the discussion following the reading of this report, which is published on pages 59 to 76 of the Report of the Twenty-ninth Annual Meeting of the National Board of Trade, held in Washington in December, 1898, and in Appendix No. 6 of this volume, a resolution was adopted by the National Board of Trade, embodying substantially the recommendations of the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce on this subject, and laying stress upon 'the value of a system of improvement on the navigable waterways of the Mississippi and Ohio Basins for irrigating and making productive vast areas of arid lands, for the continued improvement of these rivers for transportation purposes, and diminishing the destructive power of floods.

"NATIONAL IRRIGATION MOVEMENT.

"The movement thus started by the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce was taken up by the National Irrigation Association, organized on June 2, 1899, and brought about the enactment of the national irrigation act previously mentioned. This association has persistently advocated the adoption of a national policy which is stated in the constitution of the association as follows:

"The preservation and development of our national resources by the construction of storage reservoirs by the Federal Government for flood protection and to save for use in aid of navigation and irrigation the flood waters which now run to waste and cause overflow and destruction.

"A national educational propaganda was inaugurated, based upon the action of the National Board of Trade on the resolution of the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce, and also upon the recommendations of the Chittenden Report, Document No. 141, House of Representatives, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session. This report was made under an appropriation contained in the rivers and harbors act of June 3, 1896, which provided, in section 8, for a number of preliminary examinations, among which was the following:

"For the examination of sites and report upon the practicability and desirability of constructing reservoirs and other hydraulic works necessary for the storage and utilization of water, to prevent floods and overflows, erosion of river banks and breaks of levees, and to reinforce the flow of streams during drought and low-water seasons, at least one site each in the States of Wyoming and Colorado.

"The Chittenden Report, transmitted to Congress on December 6, 1897, now out of print, has attracted wide attention and may be found in part in the report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army for 1898. An abstract of this report will be found in Appendix No. 6 of the report of the flood commission. After a most exhaustive examination and consideration of the whole question of the effect and value of reservoirs to aid navigation, to prevent floods, and to furnish water for irrigation, the following conclusions were stated:

"First. A comprehensive reservoir system in the arid regions of the United States is absolutely essential to the future welfare of this portion of the public domain.

"Second. It is not possible to secure the best development of such a system except through the agency of the National Government.

"The work of the Flood Commission of Pittsburgh has related primarily, of course, to the conditions on the headwaters of the Ohio River. It is worthy of note at this point that in considering the effect of flood-water storage on the Missouri River upon floods in the lower Mississippi Valley, Col. Chittenden said:

"The floods of the Mississippi are formed by the heavy rains in the low regions east of the ninety-eighth meridian and very largely come from east of the Mississippi itself. The great controlling element, in fact in all the lower river floods, is the Ohio River.

"The relation of flood-water storage on the upper Ohio and its tributaries to river regulation and flood prevention in the lower Mississippi Valley is thus clearly set forth, and makes manifest the fact assumed in the resolution of the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce to the National Board of Trade in December, 1898, above referred to. Considered from a national point of view, flood-water storage on the Ohio Basin is but one aspect of a great national problem, which is coextensive with the entire drainage basin of the Mississippi River and all its tributaries, covering an area comprising more than one-third of the United States, and stretching from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the crest of the Appalachian range, on the east, to the crown of the continent, on the west. Hence any attempt to localize the problem must fail.

"In presenting the arguments, which make it clear that reservoir construction for river regulation is naturally and necessarily a national function, Col. Chittenden, on pages 55 and 56 of his report, says:

"In the case of reservoirs it not infrequently happens that some of the very best sites are to be found close to State lines, where the waters so stored will flow immediately into neighboring States. In these extreme cases the States where they are located could not, of course, be expected to construct reservoirs, and the States to be benefited would not be likely to go outside their own borders to do so. The function clearly pertains to that sovereignty which covers all the country and embraces the streams from their sources to the sea. It alone can store these waters and be sure that it is reaping the full benefit.

"The policy of the Government in the matter of the preservation of the forests of the country is a case directly in point. There seems to be a well-nigh universal consensus of opinion that the preservation of the forests of the arid regions is distinctly a Government duty. * * * Inasmuch as the commercial value of these forests is practically insignificant, except for furnishing fuel and rough timber, the water question is really the more important one. If it is properly a Government function to preserve the forests in order to conserve the flow of the streams, surely it can not be less a Government function to execute works which will conserve that flow even more positively and directly. Granting all that can be said of forests in this connection, they certainly can never prevent the June rise, and it is precisely this waste flow which reservoirs will help to save. The forests ought unquestionably to be preserved, and the Government is the proper agency to do it, but the principal arguments therefor apply with accentuated force to the construction of reservoirs.

"The precedent for the construction of reservoirs for river regulation and to reenforce the flow during low-water season had already been established by the construction, beginning in 1881, of five reservoirs on the headwaters of the Mississippi River, where dams were built across the outlets of natural lakes. These reservoirs are described in Appendix No. 5 of this report, and are referred to at some length by Mr. Anderson in his paper mentioned above.

"FOREST MOVEMENT.

"The National Government has now, however, by the enactment of the Appalachian National Forest bill, gone to the full extent of recognizing and using its constitutional power to control and regulate the flow of navigable rivers at their sources not only by the building of artificial reservoirs but by preserving the forests and woodland cover on the watershed as natural reservoirs.

"The maintenance and preservation of natural reservoirs by forest preservation, as provided in this act, and the construction of artificial reservoirs, as advocated by the flood commission of Pittsburgh, on the headwaters of the Ohio River in the Appalachian Mountains, involve the exercise of a constitutional power which is precisely the same in both instances. It is the same power which was exercised in the creation of the California Débris Commission, to prevent the silting up of navigable channels by the débris from hydraulic mines. It is also the same as exercised in the construction of levees on the lower Mississippi to aid in maintaining a navigable channel, notwithstanding the conceded fact that one of the greatest moving forces in that case was the necessity for protecting the plantations from overflow.

"So, in the case of reservoir construction on the headwaters of the Ohio River, the constitutional power being so clearly established, the enormous damages by floods in the Ohio Valley, estimated to average at least $50,000,000 a year, and in some years to be as high as $100,000,000, furnishes strong ground for relief from the National Government when it is conceded that such regulation of the flow of the river by reservoirs would, beyond question, immensely aid navigation and would also give relief from these destructive floods. Senator Burton clearly saw this aspect of the question when, in his speech in the Senate on the passage of the Appalachian National Forest bill, he said:

"Another thing that the Federal Government ought to do if this precedent is established, and it ought to do it right away, is to provide means for the prevention of floods. At certain seasons of the year we can hardly take up a newspaper without reading of the loss of life and of the mammoth destruction of property as a result of floods in the Ohio, the Mississippi, and various other streams of the country. Those floods have a direct influence upon navigation. If we are going to inaugurate this policy, why not protect these manifold interests by preventing floods and save the tremendous loss of property and the very pitiful loss of life which so frequently occurs?"

"EXTENSION OF POLICY TO RESERVOIRS.

"The National Government having, by the passage of the Appalachian National Forest Act, inaugurated the policy of maintaining natural reservoirs on the tributaries and source streams of the navigable rivers, for the purpose of regulating their flow, and having extended the policy of national forest reserves for that purpose into the Appalachian region, it is manifest that even-handed justice between the different sections of this great country requires that the policy of building artificial reservoirs for river regulation should also be extended over that portion of the United States lying east of the Mississippi River. Thus far everything done under that constitutional power, for the control and regulation of the flow of the navigable rivers, has been on the headwaters of the Mississippi River, or in the lower valley of that river, or in the vast territory to the west of it. The entire territory extending from the Mississippi River on the west to the Atlantic seacoast on the east has been excluded from any local participation in the benefits of expenditures under that policy.

"The flood commission of Pittsburgh now urges that the policy already inaugurated in a part of the country be made broadly national and that the East as well as the West shall be made beneficiaries under it. The Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh has at all times, from the very first, been an active and consistent advocate of the reservoir policy in the West, and now, with the same broad vision of national benefits, the flood commission organized by the chamber of commerce urges its extension to the East. All who advocate national irrigation in the West, national drainage in the South, or flood prevention in the East through national river regulation, are practically supporting one and the same national policy, and should unite to accomplish its Nation-wide adoption.

"Pittsburgh took the lead in urging this broad application of the policy as far back as 1898, and has aided other sections to secure the first benefits from its adoption. It is therefore peculiarly appropriate that Pittsburgh, after spending over $100,000 to establish the facts and showing the practicability and necessity for the adoption of the same constructive national policy in the Ohio Valley, should take the lead in a national campaign to extend the national policy of flood-water storage over the entire United States, and to all navigable rivers and their tributaries and source streams.

"THE NEWLANDS BILL.

"A bill providing for such a broad national extension of the policy of river regulation was introduced by Senator NEWLANDS in the Senate of the United States on March 1, 1911, the day the Weeks Appalachian National Forest bill became a law by the signature of the President. The purpose of this Newlands river-regulation bill was to so enlarge the forest policy inaugurated by the Weeks bill as to make it cover the entire United States, and to supplement the establishment and maintenance of the natural reservoirs, which the forests and woodland cover create, by an adequate national system of artificial reservoirs for flood-water storage. This bill, which is printed in Appendix No. 6 of this volume, was Senate bill 10900, in the Sixty-first Congress, third session, and Senate bill No. 122, in the Sixty-second Congress, first session.

"The Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh has in the past supported both the national irrigation act, which was known as the Newlands bill in the House of Representatives when it passed that body, and the Weeks Appalachian National Forest Act; and has extended its indorsement and support to the Newlands river-regulation bill by the adoption on April 13, 1911, of the following resolution:

"Whereas a bill was introduced in the Senate of the United States by Senator NEWLANDS on March 1, 1911, entitled:

"A bill to create a board of river regulation and to provide a fund for the regulation and control of the flow of navigable rivers in aid of interstate commerce, and as a means to that end to provide for flood prevention and protection and for the beneficial use of flood waters and for water storage, and for the protection of watersheds from denudation and erosion and from forest fires, and for the cooperation of Government services and bureaus with each other and with States, municipalities, and other local agencies; and

"Whereas the primary purpose of said bill is to bring into conference and cooperation the National Government with the States, municipalities, counties, and local districts, for the construction of the works necessary for the regulation of the flow of rivers and for flood prevention and protection, and it provides a fund of $50,000,000 annually for 10 years for said purpose; and

"Whereas the passage of said bill by Congress would result in the relief not only of Pittsburgh but of all cities and communities on the Ohio, Missouri, and Mississippi Rivers from destructive floods, and increase the flow of the rivers in the low-water season for navigation: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh hereby indorses said Newlands river-regulation bill and requests the Senators and Congressmen from this State to urge its passage by Congress."

The bill referred to in the foregoing resolution has been designated and known throughout the country as the Newlands river-regulation bill. It was printed in full on pages 391 to 396 of the aforesaid report of the flood commission of Pittsburgh, being S. 10900 (61st Cong., 3d sess.), introduced in the Senate of the United States by Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS on March 1, 1911, and reintroduced by him as S. 122 (62d Cong., 1st sess.) in the following session of Congress, on April 6, 1911.

The Newlands river-regulation bill was evolved and developed from a bill known as the Inland Waterways Commission bill, which was introduced in the Senate by Senator NEWLANDS on December 4, 1907 (S. 500, 60th Cong., 1st sess.) and which had been prepared with a view to securing the legislation necessary to inaugurate the national policy with reference to river regulation and a national system of waterways which was subsequently recommended by the Inland Waterways Commission in its report of February 3, 1908.

THE NEWLANDS BILL INTRODUCED IN THE SENATE DECEMBER 4, 1907.

"A bill (S. 500) providing for the appointment of an inland-waterway commission and for the improvement and development of the inland waterways of the country with a view to the promotion of transportation between the States and with foreign countries.

"Be it enacted, etc., That a special fund shall be established in the Treasury, to be known as the inland-waterway fund. to be used in the examination and survey for and the development of the inland waterways of the country; and the sum of $50,000,000 is hereby reserved, set aside, and appropriated as such fund.

"SEC. 2. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to cause to be made examinations and surveys for the development of the inland waterways of the country, including the Great Lakes, the Mississippi River and its tributaries, the navigable rivers of the Gulf of Mexico and their tributaries, the navigable rivers of the Atlantic coast and their tributaries, the navigable rivers of the Pacific coast and their tributaries, and for the connection of such rivers with each other, wherever practicable and desirable, by connecting canals and by coastal canals, with a view to the promotion of transportation between such rivers by vessels of a standard draft; and to investigate all questions relating to the development and improvement of the inland waterways of the country, with a view to the promotion of transportation; and to consider and coordinate the questions of irrigation, swamp-land reclamation, clarification of streams, utilization of water power, prevention of soil waste, protection of forests, regulation of flow, control of floods, transfer facilities and sites, and the regulation and control thereof, and such other questions regarding waterways as are related to the development of rivers, lakes, and canals for the purposes of commerce.

"SEC. 3. That in order to enable the President to make such examinations, surveys, and investigations and to construct the works provided for by this act, he is authorized to appoint an inland waterways commission, to be composed of ——— members, and to bring in coordination therewith the Corps of Engineers of the Army, the Bureau of Soils, the Forest Service, the Bureau of Corporations, the Reclamation Service, and other branches of the public service related to waterways, and to appoint such experts and other persons and create such board or boards in connection therewith as the work may require, and to fix the salaries of all commissioners, experts, and other persons employed under this act until the same has been fixed by Congress, the official salary of any official appointed or employed under this act to be deducted from the amount of salary or compensation fixed under the terms of this act.

"SEC. 4. That such commission shall make to the President annually, and at such other periods as may be required either by law or by the order of the President, full and complete reports of all their acts and doings and of all the moneys received and expended in the construction of works and in the performance of their duties in connection therewith, which reports shall be by the President transmitted to Congress; and such commission shall furthermore give to either House of Congress such information as may at any time be required either by act of Congress or by order of either House of Congress.

"The President shall cause to be provided for the use of the commissioners and other employees under this act such offices as may, with the suitable equipment of the same, be necessary and proper in his discretion for the proper discharge of their duties.

"SEC. 5. That if after such examination, survey, and estimate such commission shall determine that any project for the improvement or construction of an inland waterway or coastal waterway is practicable and desirable, it may, with the approval of the President and through the appropriate service, construct or execute, or cause to be let, contracts for the construction or execution of the same, in such portions or sections as it may be practicable to construct and execute as parts of the whole project: Provided, That the necessary moneys therefor are available in the inland waterway fund.

"SEC. 6. That such projects may include such collateral works for the irrigation of arid lands, for the reclamation of swamp lands, for the conservation or replacement of forests, for the clarification of streams, and for the utilization of water power as may be deemed advisable in connection with the development of a channel for navigation or as aiding in a compensatory way in the diminution of the cost of such project.

"SEC. 7. That such commission is authorized, with the approval of the President, to enter into cooperation with States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals in such collateral works, and to make arrangements for the proportionate payment of the cost thereof out of the inland waterway fund and by the States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals benefited thereby, in such manner as to secure an equitable distribution of the costs and benefits: Provided, That the cost of such collateral works shall be paid, if practicable, out of funds provided therefor by Congress, but if sufficient provision therefor is not specially made by Congress, such commission is authorized to pay for the same out of the inland waterway fund; but the total payments made on account of such collateral works from such inland waterway fund shall not exceed 10 per cent thereof, and provision shall be made, as far as practicable, for the reimbursement to such fund of such payments by the States, municipalities, communities, corporations, or individuals benefited thereby: And provided also, That the inland waterways developed shall remain free for all the uses of navigation.

"SEC. 8. That such commission shall make, with the approval of the President, rules and regulations governing the cooperation and compensation to the fund, wherever practicable, by the conveyance of reclamation rights, the lease of water power, and such other means as may be beneficial to the United States and the several States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals entering into such cooperation.

"SEC. 9. That in carrying out the provisions of this act regard must be had, as far as practicable, to the equitable apportionment and contemporaneous execution of the projects contemplated under this act among the several waterway systems of the country.

"SEC. 10. That the President is authorized, whenever the inland-waterway fund is reduced below $20,000,000, to make up the deficiency in such fund by the issue and sale of bonds in such amount and for such time as he shall deem advisable, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding — per cent per annum; but the amount of bonds issued shall not at any time exceed the difference between the cash on hand in such fund and $50,000,000."

APPROVED BY WAR DEPARTMENT.

The foregoing bill, known as the inland-waterways bill (S. 500), upon its introduction was referred to the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, and by that committee the bill was referred to the War Department for its suggestions and recommendations.

The bill was returned by the War Department to the Committee on Commerce with a communication, bearing date April 17, 1908, from the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, approving the bill, with some amendments which were suggested in detail in the communication.

Extracts from this communication from the Secretary of War were embodied in an address by Senator NEWLANDS in the Senate on February 18, 1910, at the time of the introduction by him of the first river regulation amendment on that date, from which address the following is quoted:

"Here is what Secretary Taft said upon this subject in his letter of April 17, 1908, addressed to the Senate Committee on Commerce regarding Senate bill 500, which I had introduced in the Sixtieth Congress, and which was similar in its terms to Senate bill 3717, introduced by me in this Congress.

"(c) The bill provides for correlating the existing agencies in the Departments of War, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce and Labor through certain powers vested in the President. The need for some such plan is sufficiently shown by the fact that while this country is better endowed with waterways than any other our streams are less used for navigation and other public purposes than those of other countries. Since this provision touches duties placed on the War Department by law, it has received careful consideration. It does not appear that the measure would interfere with the functions of the War Department, or with the continuation and extension of the engineering work now performed there, but it is believed that the provision for administration would tend to promote the general welfare. Accordingly this feature meets the approbation of the War Department.

"(e) The bill provides also for the initiation of projects by a board of experts. These provisions affect the work of the War Department and have had careful consideration. Suitable provisions for expert initiation and prompt execution are essential to the proper development of any system of river improvement. The chief defect in the methods hitherto pursued lies in the absence of executive authority for originating comprehensive plans covering the country or natural divisions thereof. The creation of an Inland Waterways Commission for the purpose of initiating plans for the improvement of waterways seems to me a more effective way of a general plan for the improvement of all the waterways in the country than under the present provisions of law. This would not dispense with the admirable machinery furnished by the War Department for the improvement of waterways when the plan has been determined upon and is to be executed. But it supplies what does not exist in the law now—a tribunal other than Congress charged with the duty of originating and developing a satisfactory plan.

"Secretary Taft adds:

"3. In its present form the bill might be construed to curtail indirectly certain functions of the War Department, which is now charged with large discretion in waterway affairs. Possible ambiguity on this point should be removed.

"Mr. Taft goes on and gives the history of the Engineer Corps of the Army and shows how it drifted into the control of our waterways.

"Under the same long-standing arrangement—

"Mr. Taft says—

"it is the policy of the War Department to maintain a trained body of military engineers with a view to the national defense, and to keep these engineers in training in time of peace by detail to civil duty allied to their professional duty in time of war or military preparation; and it was carrying out this policy that the functions of the War Department pertaining to waterways have been more and more largely intrusted to the engineers of the Army during the 110 years since the Army and Navy were separated in distinct departments. This policy has long been sustained by the Congress, although the military engineers have been prohibited from initiating projects or originating plans for meeting the growing needs of commerce. It is desirable to continue the policy of keeping the military engineers in training and at the same time rendering their skilled service available in work on waterways, although it is not necessary to vest them with the power of initiative, which they have not exercised in the past and which is, perhaps, inconsistent with their primary duty in connection with the military establishment of which they form a part. A provision that the Chief of Engineers of the Army shall be a member of the commission proposed to be created, and a further provision specifically covering the detail of military engineers to the service of the commission whenever such detail shall be consistent with their military duties, would remove any possible ambiguity and would be in accord with the custom and policy of the War Department.

"THE WATERWAYS COMMISSION APPROVES.

"Here also is the letter of the Inland Waterways Commission, signed by Theodore E. Burton, chairman, which, referring to this bill, states as follows:

"1. Several of the leading provisions of the bill are in accord with the recommendations of the commission in a report submitted on February 3 last and transmitted to the Congress by the President on February 26. Among these are (a) the provision for coordination of navigation with related uses of the waters; (b) the provision for cooperation between the Federal Government, States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals; (c) the provision for correlating existing agencies in the Departments of War, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce and Labor in such manner as to secure effective administration; and (d) the provisions looking toward the control of running waters in such manner as to protect and promote navigation. In so far as these provisions are concerned, the bill has the unqualified approbation of the commission.

* * * * * * *

"3. The general purpose of the bill is in harmony with the comprehensive plan for improving and developing the waterways of the country framed by the commission and approved by the President in his message of February 26 last.

"It is fair to say that this expression was somewhat modified by Gen. Mackenzie, Chief of the Engineer Corps, whose views, however, as I recall, accord with the modified provisions of the pending amendment.

"I think the honored chairman of that committee, Mr. Burton, will bear witness with me as to the intelligent service rendered by the chiefs of the scientific services of the country who were on that commission. I am sure that ever since my experience with them I have had a higher idea of their efficiency, their capacity, and their high public spirit. I know of no organization in a business way in the country that surpasses the scientific services of the country in integrity and in efficiency."

THE INLAND WATERWAYS COMMISSION.

The Inland Waterways Commission was created by President Roosevelt on March 14, 1907, with the following membership: Hon. Theodore E. Burton, chairman; Senator Francis G. Newlands, vice chairman; Senator William Warner, Hon. John H. Bankhead, Gen. Alexander Mackenzie, Mr. W J McGee, Mr. F. H. Newell, Mr. Gifford Pinchot, Hon. Herbert Knox Smith.

The following brief summary of the activities of this commission is quoted from page 17 of its printed report:

"PROCEEDINGS.

"After conference and correspondence between the chairman and other commissioners, a meeting for organization was held in the United States Capitol, beginning April 20 and ending May 3 (1907). A second meeting and inspection trip on the Mississippi River from St. Louis to The Passes took place May 13 to May 23. A third meeting and inspection trip, first on the Great Lakes from Cleveland to Duluth, next on the Mississippi from St. Paul to Memphis, and then on the Missouri from Kansas City to St. Louis, took place September 21 to October 13. A fourth meeting was held in the United States Capitol, beginning on November 25, 1907, for the purpose of preparing a preliminary report; it ended February 3, 1908."

The report above referred to was adopted and transmitted to President Roosevelt on February 3, 1908, and by him transmitted to Congress on February 26, 1908.

The report was printed as Senate Document No. 325, Sixtieth Congress, first session, entitled "Preliminary Report of the Inland Waterways Commission."

The work of the Inland Waterways Commission ended with this report, on which no action was taken by Congress at that time.

Subsequently the United States National Waterways Commission, composed of 12 Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, was created by act of Congress of March 3, 1909.

The statute creating the National Waterways Commission provided that a preliminary report should be filed not later than January 1, 1910, containing conclusions reached by the commission upon the several subjects investigated. Such a report was made.

This United States National Waterways Commission, "having concluded its investigation of questions relating to water transportation and the improvement of waterways," ended its labors by the submission to Congress of its final report, which was ordered printed on March 25, 1912, and was thereafter printed as Senate Document No. 469, Sixty-second Congress, third session, entitled "Final Report of the National Waterways Commission."

The preliminary report of this commission was printed in full on pages 65 to 95 of that same volume.

No action based on these reports of the United States National Waterways Commission has ever been taken by Congress.

The action now taken by the adoption of the river-regulation policy embodied in section 18 of the river and harbor bill of 1917 is in accordance with the recommendations not of the National Waterways Commission but of the Inland Waterways Commission, as set forth in the report of the Inland Waterways Commission made on February 3, 1908, the closing paragraph of the final recommendations of that report having been as follows:

"We recommend that the Congress be asked to authorize the coordination and proper development of existing public services connected with waterways, and we suggest that such enactment might provide that the President of the United States be authorized, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint and organize a national waterways commission, to bring into coordination the Corps of Engineers of the Army, the Bureau of Soils, the Forest Service, the Bureau of Corporations, the Reclamation Service, and other branches of the public service in so far as their work relates to inland waterways, and that he be authorized to make such details and require such duties from these branches of the public service in connection with navigable and source streams as are not inconsistent with law; the said commission to continue the investigation of all questions relating to the development and improvement and utilization of the inland waterways of the country and the conservation of its natural resources related thereto, and to consider and coordinate therewith all matters of irrigation, swamp and overflow land reclamation, clarification and purification of streams, prevention of soil waste, utilization of water power, preservation and extension of forests, regulation of flow and control of floods, transfer facilities and sites and the regulation and control thereof, and the relations between waterways and railways; and that the commission be empowered to frame and recommend plans for developing the waterways and utilizing the waters, and as authorized by Congress to carry out the same through established agencies, when such are available, in cooperation with States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals in such manner as to secure equitable distribution of costs and benefits."

A comparison of the foregoing recommendation of the Inland Waterways Commission with the river-regulation amendment embodied in section 18 of the river and harbor bill of 1917, exemplifies the fact that after an interval of nine years and seven months, during which the report of the Inland Waterways Commission has lain dormant, and the commission has been out of existence, the tenacity of purpose of the advocates of river regulation has finally prevailed to the extent, at least, of securing the inauguration of so much of the national policy of river regulation as was recommended in the section quoted above from the report of the Inland Waterways Commission of February, 1908.

The complete statement of the conclusions of the Inland Waterways Commission, as embodied in this preliminary report of February 3, 1908, hereinbefore referred to, was as follows:

"The commission is fully aware that its creation was due to a demand of the people, and that there exists an expectation in certain localities that the report here presented will include plans extending in detail to the principal waterways of the country. To prepare and consider such plans would require extended study at large expense by engineers and other experts whose services were not available. Under the instructions from the President, and in the absence of funds and of the men and time required for such study, the commission was necessarily confined in preparing this preliminary report to the more general features of 'A comprehensive plan designed for the benefit of the entire country,' viz, a statement of principles and an outline of policy, coupled with recommendations which, if adopted, will insure the continuation of the work and the practical application of the principles and policy.

"FINDINGS.

"1. The possibilities of inland navigation are indicated by the fact that there are in mainland United States some 25,000 miles of navigated rivers and at least an equal amount which are navigable or might be made so by improvement; there are also some 2,500 miles of navigable canals and over 2,500 miles of sounds, bays, and bayous readily connectible by canals, aggregating less than 1,000 miles in length, to form inner passages paralleling the Atlantic and Gulf coasts—these being additional to some thousands of miles (reckoned between leading ports) of regularly navigated waters in lakes and land-locked bays. These waterways lie in or along the borders of Alabama, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, and Wisconsin, i. e., 42 States; while the development of rivers for irrigation, power, and other purposes will also render navigable certain waterways in Arizona, Colorado, Nevada, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming. Although it is not probable that any considerable share of this vast mileage of navigable waterways will be improved to a high standard of efficiency, at least at an early date, yet the assured growth of the country and the capacity of these waters, not only for navigation but for other uses, render imperative the necessity for their control and utilization as an asset of almost unlimited value. It is desirable that these waterways, of which portions have been surveyed or improved for purposes of navigation, should be further investigated with a view to the systematic development of interstate commerce in coordination with all other uses of the waters and benefits to be derived from them.

"2. While the railways of mainland United States have been notably efficient in extending and promoting the production and commerce of the country, it is clear that at seasons recurring with increasing frequency they are unable to keep pace with production or to meet the requirements of transportation.

"3. While navigation of the inland waterways declined with the increase in rail transportation during the later decades of the past century, it has become clear that the time is at hand for restoring and developing such inland navigation and water transportation as upon expert examination may appear to confer a benefit commensurate with the cost, to be utilized both independently and as a necessary adjunct to rail transportation.

"4. While the decline of navigation in the inland waterways was largely due to the natural growth and legitimate competition attending railway extension, it is also clear that railway interests have been successfully directed against the normal maintenance and development of water traffic by control of water fronts and terminals, by acquisition or control of competing canals and vessels, by discriminating tariffs, rebates, by adverse placement of tracks and structures, and by other means.

"5. Any complete or practically successful plan for the general improvement of waterways must eventually provide for satisfactory adjustment of the relation of rail lines to such waterways. Since present and prospective railways reach all parts of the country while navigable waterways are confined to certain natural lines, it is clear that railways can so control transportation as to leave the waterways insufficient traffic to support the requisite vessels and terminals. The railways have accordingly, save in certain exceptional cases, substantially absorbed the traffic of the country, and unless the present unrestricted and short-sighted competition between the two systems is intelligently adjusted they will continue to do so. So large a portion of railway traffic is free from water competition that railways can readily afford to so reduce rates on those portions affected by such competition as to destroy the profits of the water lines without appreciably affecting the profits of the rail systems which recoup these reductions by higher rates elsewhere. This has been the case with most of the great inland waterways, excepting the Great Lakes, where the conditions of water and traffic approach those of open seas. In spite of the great increase of traffic and the continued improvement of waterways, the total river traffic of the country has steadily decreased both proportionately and absolutely, with the result that few rivers are used to anything approaching their full capacity. It will not relieve traffic congestion to improve our waterways unless the improved waterways are used; hence it is obvious that relief from the existing congestion by waterway improvement can be made permanently effective through coordination of rail and water facilities as will insure harmonious cooperation rather than injurious opposition.

"6. Existing data as to the nature and amount of the internal commerce of the country are extremely meager and incomplete. Such information is essential to the intelligent treatment of the inland waterways, and it is desirable that means be employed to obtain it.

"7. Improvements of navigation in inland waterways in the main affect favorably the purity of the waters and the regularity of the supply, and these objects should be carefully kept in mind. The increasing pollution of streams by soil wash and other waste substances connected with a growing population reduces the value of the water for manufacturing purposes, and renders the water supply for communities injurious to and often destructive of human life. The prevention of these evils should be considered in any scheme of inland waterway improvement.

"8. Engineering works designed to improve navigation affect favorably the regimen of the streams, including floods and low waters. The annual floods of the United States occasion loss of property reaching many millions of dollars with considerable loss of life, while the low water of late summer involves large loss in diminished water supply, in reduced power, and in the fouling of streams with consequent disease and death. It has been claimed that in specific cases the cost of works required both to control floods and meet the needs of commerce would be less than the amount of this loss. It is desirable that more detailed information be collected concerning the effects of floods and low waters and their prevention by engineering works and other devices.

"9. The annual soil wash in mainland United States is estimated at about 1,000,000,000 tons, of which the greater part is the most valuable portion of the soil; it is carried into the rivers where it pollutes the waters, necessitates frequent and costly dredging, and reduces the efficiency of works designed to facilitate navigation and afford protection from floods. The direct and indirect losses from this source have not been measured, but are exceedingly large; and it is desirable that definite determinations be made with the view of devising means for reducing the loss to the land and preventing the impairment of the streams for purposes of commerce.

"10. Both the regimen of streams and the purity and clarity of waters are affected by forests and other natural growths and by farming, mining, and other industrial operations over the watersheds in which they gather. Millions of acres in mainland United States have been deforested unnecessarily, and the floods and low waters ascribed to this cause have in some localities occasioned losses commensurate with the value of the timber. Means should be devised and applied for coordinating forestry, farming, mining, and related industries with the uses of streams for commerce and for other purposes.

"11. The effect of wide variations in the level of navigable streams is to render difficult the establishment of necessary terminals for the handling of traffic, and thus to interfere seriously with the utilization of our inland waterways. The prevention or mitigation of such variations would be most helpful to the revival of river traffic, and means to this end should be adopted in plans for waterway improvement.

"12. The storage of flood waters combined with the diversion of streams to arid and semiarid lands for purposes of reclamation by irrigation creates canals and also tends to clarify the waters and increase the seepage or return waters during times of drought. There have already been put under irrigation over 10,000,000 acres of fertile land, adding a quarter of a million homes and several hundred million dollars of taxable wealth, and it is estimated that by fully conserving the waters and by utilizing the water power developed in connection with storage and other works fully three times as much land can be reclaimed in the western half of the United States. It is desirable to continue the collection of data with a view to so adjusting irrigation and power development with navigation and other uses of the streams as to secure the highest value of the water to the greatest number of people.

"13. Locks and certain other works designed to improve navigation commonly produce head and store water in such manner as to develop power available for industrial purposes, while works designed to develop power on navigable and source streams affect the navigation and other uses of river systems; and these uses must necessarily be considered together. Information concerning water power in the several States and sections is incomplete, yet it is known to be a vast and intrinsically permanent asset which should be utilized for the benefit of the people of the country, in whose interests it should be administered with careful regard for present and prospective conditions. The facts ascertained in certain specific cases furnish a basis for the claim that the value of the power would pay the cost of all engineering and other works required in such cases to control the streams for navigation and other uses. In the light of recent progress in electrical application, it is clear that over wide areas the appropriation of water power offers an unequaled opportunity for monopolistic control of industries. Wherever water is now or will hereafter become the chief source of power the monopolization of electricity produced from running streams involves monopoly of power for the transportation of freight and passengers, for manufacturing, and for supplying heat, light, and other domestic, agricultural, and municipal necessities to such an extent that unless regulated it will entail monopolistic control of the daily life of our people in an unprecedented degree. There is here presented an urgent need for prompt and vigorous action by State and Federal Governments.

"14. Any comprehensive system of improvement of inland waterways will necessarily affect the drainage or reclamation of swamp and overflow lands, which are mainly rich alluvial tracts largely along or near waterways. The construction of dikes and levees or bank-protective works and the deepening of channels are often closely connected with means of control both of overflow and of underflow by drainage. It is estimated that there are 77,000,000 acres of such land, now unproductive, but which, with drainage and protection from overflow, will have exceptionally high agricultural value; if divided into 40-acre farms, these lands will furnish homes for 10,000,000 people.

"15. The control of waterways on which successful navigation depends is so intimately connected with the prevention of floods and low waters and works designed for these purposes, with the protection and reclamation of overflow lands and works designed therefor; with the safeguarding of banks and maintenance of channels and works employed therein; with the purification and clarification of water supply and works designed therefor in conjunction with interstate commerce; with control and utilization of power developed in connection with works for the improvement of navigation; with the standardization of methods and facilities and the coordinating of waterway and railway instrumentalities; and throughout the larger areas of the country with reclamation by irrigation and drainage and works designed primarily for these purposes, that local and special questions concerning the control of waterways should be treated as a general question of national extent, while local or special projects should be considered as parts of a comprehensive policy of waterway control in the interests of all the people.

"16. Governmental agencies whose work is related to the use and control of streams are now in existence in the Federal Departments of War, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce and Labor; and it is desirable, in order to prevent duplication of work and function and to avoid unnecessary delays in the development of the inland waterways, that means should be provided for coordinating all such agencies.

"17. While precise figures are not now obtainable, it is safe to say that the current value of our inland transportation facilities (of which railways form all but a small percentage) exceeds one-eighth of our national wealth; yet these facilities are so far inadequate that production is impaired and the growth of the country is retarded. While trustworthy estimates can not be made without further data, it is reasonable to anticipate that congestion of interstate commerce can be obviated in large measure by judicious improvement of waterways adapted to barge and boat traffic at a figure much less than that estimated by competent authorities for so increasing railway facilities as to meet present needs. It is desirable that additional data be obtained by requisite expert investigation.

"18. It is conservative to estimate that judicious improvement of the waterways of the country will confer direct benefits through increased transportation facilities which will exceed the cost, while the collateral benefits will be at least comparable with the gain to commerce. Under a coordinated plan, such collateral benefits as the enhanced value of lands reclaimed by irrigation and drainage, the value of water power developed, the increased values due to the prevention of floods and low waters, and the great benefits of purified and clarified water will more than balance the cost of the works.

"19. In a comprehensive system of water improvement and control designed to meet present and future needs, the practicability of any project will depend not alone on local and general demands of commerce, but measurably on attendant natural and industrial conditions, including nature of banks and bed, suitability of the ground as a foundation for works, volume of water, and liability to floods and low stages, configuration of the watershed and its susceptibility to control by judicious agriculture and forestry or by reservoirs and other means, local and general demand for pure-water supply, amount and value of available water power incident to the works, proximity and cost of structural material, relations to existing and prospective projects on the same and neighboring waterways, and all other physical and economic factors entering into or tending to counterbalance the cost; and the local surveys or plans for any project should take account of all such natural and industrial conditions and be adapted to the attainment of maximum benefits at the minimum cost.

"20. Existing data concerning the volume, regimen, and other physical features of most streams are meager and imperfect. Since plans for improving and controlling the waterways and utilizing the waters must rest on these facts it is desirable that means be employed to extend and perfect physical data relating to the navigable and source streams of the country.

"21. The benefits of a comprehensive system of waterway improvement will extend to all the people in the several sections and States of the country, and the means employed should be devised, so far as possible, to distribute the cost equitably through cooperation between Federal agencies, States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals.

"22. In order to improve the inland waterways for navigation and at the same time coordinate the agencies and means of transportation, develop the collateral benefits of waterway improvement, adapt all natural and industrial conditions related with waterways to the attainment of maximum benefits at the minimum cost, and perfect means for distributing the cost equitably between Federal agencies, States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals in a prompt and efficient and economical manner, it is desirable to maintain an administrative agency with large powers for the investigation and elaboration of projects under suitable legislative regulation.

"23. The immediate use of natural resources in the rapid development of the country are often allowed to stand in the way of more beneficent and permanent utilization. This is especially true of all resources connected with running waters, the substantial value of which has not been adequately appreciated. It is clearly practicable, without undue expense or interference with current use, to carry out broad plans for the complete development of the resources of the country, and thus assure to the greatest number of people the greatest good for both the present and the future, while if this is not done the temporary or partial development of these resources will prevent their full utilization for the general benefit. Steps should be taken without delay to outline and initiate the more pressing projects of conservation, and to apply practically the principle of conservation before it is too late.

"24. Our unsurpassed natural wealth and the eagerness of our people for immediate results regardless of future needs have led to a policy of extravagant consumption of national resources and to an encouragement of monopoly, whereby an excessive share of such resources has been diverted to the enrichment of the few rather than preserved for the equitable benefit of the many. Monopolistic tendencies have appeared (a) in the extensive control of mineral fuels on public lands, whereby large values essential to the development of the country have passed beyond public regulation; (b) in the acquisition and needless destruction of forests, whose preservation is a public necessity for stream control for timber supply and for other purposes; (c) in the acquisition of controlling sites on waterways and the appropriation of valuable water powers with their segregation from public uses without adequate compensation, whereby indispensable utilities escape public regulation in the interests of the people; (d) in the segregation of lands, especially in the semi-arid regions, whereby development is retarded so that the lands remain without benefit to commerce or advantage to the growth of the country; (e) in the control of products and of transportation to disturb the normal values and natural channels of trade, thereby imposing undue burdens on producers and consumers; and (f) in various interferences with the production and commerce of the country, whereby prosperity is curtailed and progress impeded. While such monopolistic tendencies have been conspicuous in connection with the agencies of transportation, they are now in many cases opposing the best utilization of streams by diverting their control from State and Federal jurisdiction in the public interests to personal and corporate means of excessive and burdensome profit. Since transportation is a primary factor in the existence and development of any people, and is increasingly important with the growth of population, it is essential that its means should be regulated in the public interests; and any plans for relieving congestion of transportation in the United States should be so framed as to employ all proper State, Federal, and municipal agencies in protecting from monopolistic control not only the agencies and avenues but also the materials of interstate commerce.

"RECOMMENDATIONS.

"A. We recommend that hereafter plans for the improvement of navigation in inland waterways, or for any use of these waterways in connection with interstate commerce, shall take account of the purification of the waters, the development of power, the control of floods, the reclamation of lands by irrigation and drainage, and all other uses of the waters or benefits to be derived from their control.

"B. We recommend that hereafter both local and general benefits to the people shall be fully considered in any such plans for the improvement of navigation in inland waterways or for any use of these waterways in connection with interstate commerce; and that wherever practicable Federal agencies shall cooperate with States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals with a view to an equitable distribution of costs and benefits.

"C. We recommend that hereafter any plans for the navigation or other use of inland waterways in connection with interstate commerce shall take full account of transfer facilities and sites and of the location of tracks, grades, bridges, dams, depots, and other works on navigable and source streams with a view to equitable cooperation between waterway and railway facilities for the promotion of commerce and the benefit of the people.

"D. We recommend that any plans for improving the inland waterways shall take account of the present and prospective relation of rail lines to such waterways, and shall ascertain so far as may be whether such waterways when improved will be effectively used in the face of railway competition; and that the relations between railways and waterways be further examined with the purpose of devising means of rendering the two systems complementary and harmonious and making such fair division of traffic that rates and management may be coordinated economically and with benefit to the country.

"E. We recommend the adoption of means for ascertaining regularly all facts related to traffic on the inland waterways and for publishing the same in a form suitable for general use.

"F. We recommend the adoption of means for ascertaining and rendering available, at such rate as to meet public necessities, all requisite data related to the physical character and general utility of the navigable and source streams of the country.

"G. We recommend that hereafter any plans for the use of inland waterways in connection with interstate commerce shall regard the streams of the country as an asset to the people, shall take full account of the conservation of all resources connected with running waters, and shall look to the protection of these resources from monopoly and to their administration in the interests of the people.

"H. We recommend that the Congress be asked to make suitable provision for improving the inland waterways of the United States at a rate commensurate with the needs of the people as determined by competent authority; and we suggest that such provision meet these requisites, viz, expert framing of a definite policy; certainty of continuity and coordination of plan and work; expert initiative in the choice of projects and the succession of works; freedom in selection of projects in accordance with terms of cooperation; and the widest opportunity for applying modern business methods.

"I. We recommend that the Congress be asked to authorize the coordination and proper development of existing public services connected with waterways; and we suggest that such enactment might provide that the President of the United States be authorized, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint and organize a National Waterways Commission, to bring into coordination the Corps of Engineers of the Army, the Bureau of Soils, the Forest Service, the Bureau of Corporations, the Reclamation Service, and other branches of the public service in so far as their work relates to inland waterways, and that he be authorized to make such details and require such duties from these branches of the public service in connection with navigable and source streams as are not inconsistent with law; the said commission to continue the investigation of all questions relating to the development and improvement and utilization of the inland waterways of the country and the conservation of its natural resources related thereto, and to consider and coordinate therewith all matters of irrigation, swamp, and overflow land reclamation, clarification and purification of streams, prevention of soil waste, utilization of water power, preservation and extension of forests, regulation of flow and control of floods, transfer facilities and sites and the regulation and control thereof, and the relations between waterways and railways; and that the commission be empowered to frame and recommend plans for developing the waterways and utilizing the waters, and as authorized by Congress to carry out the same, through established agencies when such are available, in cooperation with States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals, in such manner as to secure equitable distrbution of costs and benefits.

"SUPPLEMENTARY REPORT OF COMMISSIONER SENATOR FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS.

"I concur in the report of the commission, but desire to emphasize my belief that it is of the highest importance that in dealing with subjects relating to the respective powers, rights, and interests of the Nation, States, municipalities, corporations, and individuals large powers and a comparatively free hand should be given to an administrative body of experts in the full development of projects, lest the complexity of the transactions, the time necessary to secure congressional approval, and difference of view as to purpose of method may result in indecision and delay, the worst enemies of effective development.

"An ample fund should be provided, to be reenforced from time to time either by legislative appropriation or by bond issue, and the administrative board or commission should be given the power not only to investigate projects but also, when determined to be feasible, to enter, with the approval of the President, upon their immediate execution; but the power should be limited so as to prevent such administrative body from entering into any contract unless there are sufficient unappropriated moneys in the fund to meet the cost thereof.

"Unless some method of construction and development insuring prompt decision and execution and continuous and consecutive work by a body of experts is adopted, I fear that the best of projects may be wrecked in the shoals and quicksands of legislation.

"FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS."

The statement above set forth of the findings and recommendations of the Inland Waterways Commission will be found on pages 18 to 27 and the supplementary report of Commissioner Senator Francis G. Newlands, on pages 30 and 31 of the Preliminary Report of the Inland Waterways Commission, Senate Document No. 325, Sixtieth Congress, first session.

It also appears, as above republished, in Senate Document No. 550, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, entitled "River Regulation, Flood Control, and Water Conservation and Utilization. Hearing before the subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce, United States Senate, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, on S. 5736, a bill to promote interstate commerce, agriculture, and the general welfare by providing for the development and control of waterways and water resources, for water conservation for flood control, prevention, and protection; for the application of flood waters to beneficial uses; and for cooperation in such work with States and other agencies, and for other purposes," pages 147 to 153.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S RECOMMENDATION.

In the letter of transmittal by the President to Congress of the report of the Inland Waterways Commission on February 26, 1908, President Roosevelt closed the letter with the following urgent recommendation:

"The development of our waterways and the conservation of our forests are the two most pressing physical needs of the country. They are interdependent, and they should be met vigorously, together, and at once. The question of organization, powers, and appropriations are now before Congress. There is urgent need for prompt and decisive action."

EVOLUTION OF NEWLANDS RIVER-REGULATION BILL.

From that time until the present the effort to secure action from Congress has never ceased. The campaign has been steadfastly and continuously conducted. In nearly every session of Congress measures have been urged by Senator NEWLANDS with a view to securing action that would inaugurate the broad and comprehensive river regulation, waterways, and water resources national policy embodied in the river-regulation amendment which Congress has now adopted. Until this session no such comprehensive legislation has been enacted. Congress has confined its action to such incomplete, inadequate, and piecemeal or local legislation as the White Mountain and Appalachian National Forest Reserve act, passed in February, 1911, and the Mississippi and Sacramento Rivers flood-control act, passed at the last session.

The following references to bills introduced and to debates and remarks in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, and to public addresses and articles in newspapers, periodicals, and magazines by Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, from 1894 to 1917, furnishes a historical reference record, extending over a period of 23 years, of the development of the river-regulation movement from the reclamation movement originating in the West, and of the evolution of congressional action relating to that movement, from the earliest measures introduced down to the final inauguration of the comprehensive river regulation and waterways and water resources policy embodied in the river-regulation amendment, section 18, of the river and harbor bill of 1917.

July 14, 1913: Introduced S. 2739: A bill to create a waterways commission and a board of river regulation. The bill is printed in full on pages 2393 to 2395 of the RECORD of this date. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 50, pt. 3, pp. 2392–2395.)

January 31, 1914: Introduced an amendment in the nature of a substitute for S. 2739, this substitute bearing the same number, and being known as the Newlands-Broussard river-regulation bill. It is printed in full in the RECORD of this date. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 51, pt. 3, pp. 2635–2638.)

In his remarks on the introduction of this bill, Senator NEWLANDS said:

> I wish to introduce the bill which I send to the desk as a substitute for the bill (S. 2739) known throughout the country as the Newlands river-regulation bill, submitted by me on July 14, 1913. This substitute is intended to remove all doubt as to the purpose of the original bill regarding the Mississippi River. It proposes to make the Mississippi River, with its banks, its levees, its spillways, and its cut-offs, a national highway.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this same date, following the bill, articles were printed entitled, as follows:

1. Editorial from the Memphis News-Scimitar, January 15, 1914.

2. Editorial from the Mobile Item, January 22, 1914.

3. Resolutions of the Trans-Mississippi Commercial Congress, fourteenth annual session, Seattle, Wash., August 18–21, 1903.

4. Flood control—Impounding waters at their sources, by George H. Maxwell. From the Southern Lumberman, Nashville, Tenn., December, 1914. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 51, pt. 3, pp. 2634–2640.)

June 22, 1914: River-regulation amendment to rivers and harbors bill introduced, with explanatory remarks. Amendment printed in RECORD and referred to Senate Committee on Commerce. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 51, pt. 11, pp. 10833–10834.)

July 9, 1914: Debate; discussion of the river-regulation amendment, the Newlands-Broussard bill, and the river and harbor bill. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 51, pt. 12, pp. 11864–11866.)

December 23, 1914: Reintroduction river-regulation amendment, remarks on river-regulation bill, Democratic platforms, 1908–1912.

In the course of his remarks Senator NEWLANDS said:

"The President, without committing himself to this or any measure, is inclined to favor the general principles of the bill; but he does not think that there is time enough for its consideration at the short session.

"While I am reluctant to lessen the pressure for legislation on this important question, and believe that the force of public sentiment should be continuously exerted, and while I have reason to believe that the measure which I have been advocating has the support of thinking people in every section of the country, I can not take exception to the position of the President, burdened as he is with the advocacy of other measures of great importance. I have therefore concluded not to press the matter in any form at this session unless a decided change in the conditions takes place.

"I wish, however, to impress the friends of river regulation and water development with these facts:

"First. That public opinion is against the present system of river and harbor improvements.

"Second. That the committees of the Senate and House are favorable to the present system and will abandon it with great reluctance.

"Third. That it is necessary for that reason to maintain the pressure of a sound public opinion in order to force the consideration of the measure.

"To this end I think it important that the development of the rivers should be entirely separated from the development of the harbors. The harbors are a part of foreign commerce. The rivers are a part of interstate commerce. The harbors bill should go to the Commerce Committee in the Senate. The river regulation bill should, in my judgment, in the Senate go to the Interstate Commerce Committee, of which I am chairman, and not to the Commerce Committee, as the chairman of the Commerce Committee contends.

"In the Senate this bill now lies on the table awaiting the determination of the Senate itself as to which committee the bill shall go to. If it goes to the Interstate Commerce Committee, we can then formulate all the necessary legislation that will make river development dovetail with the development of railroad transportation. Provisions can be secured in that legislation that will prevent the destruction of river transportation by the unfair competition of the railroads. Interstate commerce is one subject, and it should not be divided between two committees.

"For the reasons above given I have concluded not to press the river regulation bill at this session, but to press it with vigor at the next session of Congress, and I urge all who feel the importance of river regulation to bring the weight of their personal influence to its support. It has been indorsed throughout the entire country by chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and waterway associations. It has been hospitably received by the press of the country. It has received the indorsement of several State legislatures. It is the only concrete measure upon which public opinion can be concentrated. It is no new thing.

"Pressure for the bill gives concrete expression to a favorable public sentiment regarding the principles of the bill and does away with the necessity for tedious elaboration in its advocacy. I invite the hearty support of all people who believe that water is a valuable asset; that it should be conserved and regulated as such, and that its highest uses should be developed and maintained with scientific accuracy. As the President so happily expressed it to the irrigation congress at Salt Lake, 'the floods should be turned from a menace into a blessing.'

"Now, Mr. President, I offer, but not with a view to pressing the matter, an amendment to the river and harbor bill similar to the one which I offered at the last session. That amendment refers simply to the organization of the commission, and not to the creation of a fund."

The river-regulation amendment above referred to is printed in the RECORD of this date. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 52, pt. 1, pp. 623–624.)

February 4, 1916: Remarks in protest against inadequate methods of dealing with flood problem. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 3, p. 2105.)

February 19, 1916: The Newlands-Broussard river-regulation bill proposed as an amendment to the Shields water-power bill (S. 3331). (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 3, p. 2805.)

March 8, 1916: Debate. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 3, pp. 3732–3736.)

April 11, 1916: Senator NEWLANDS presented the following documents, which were printed in full in the RECORD:

1. Telegram from Walter Parker, general manager New Orleans Association of Commerce, to Hon. William C. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, dated February 15, 1916, and containing a copy of telegram from Woodrow Wilson to FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, president Irrigation Congress, Salt Lake, Utah, dated Seagirt, N. J., September 20, 1912.

2. Letter from President Woodrow Wilson to Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, United States Senate, dated the White House, April 3, 1916, transmitting report of the Interdepartmental Cabinet Committee, dated Washington, February 26, 1916, and signed by the Secretaries of Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 6, p. 5871.)

April 11, 1916: Remarks by Senator NEWLANDS explaining the difference between the Ransdell-Humphreys flood-control bill and the Newlands-Broussard river-regulation bill, and the recommendations of the Interdepartmental Cabinet Committee with relation to both bills. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 6, p. 5872.)

April 17, 1916: Senator NEWLANDS introduced river-regulation amendment to river and harbor bill (H. R. 12193) with the following remarks:

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the river and harbor bill, embracing the recommendations of the Secretaries of the Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce to the President of the United States, regarding a full and broad system of river regulation and control. These recommendations were recently transmitted to me by the President of the United States in a letter, which, with the accompanying recommendations, were at my instance recently printed in the RECORD. They were recommendations made by an interdepartmental committee appointed by the President two years ago, consisting of the Secretaries of War, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce. Owing to a vacancy in the War Secretaryship the recommendations were signed only by the three other Secretaries, but I am informed that the recently appointed Secretary of War is in harmony with them. The letter of the President and the recommendations of the Secretaries will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 11, 1916." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 7, p. 6269.)

The river-regulation amendment introduced as aforesaid on April 17, 1916, is printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, pages 6269–6270.

April 24, 1916: Introduced S. 5736. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 7, p. 6688.)

May 9, 1916: Remarks prompted by discussion of appropriation in rivers and harbors bill as to floods in Kansas; conference at office of governor of Kansas; inadequacy of flood-control bill. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 8, p. 7656.)

May 18, 1916: Remarks. Flood-control bill; correspondence with Hon. B. G. HUMPHREYS. The Humphreys bill and the Newlands bill printed in parallel columns. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 8, pp. 8232–8235.)

May 18, 1916: Remarks: Coordination of rail and water transportation. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 8, p. 8248.)

May 22, 1916: Remarks in protest against piecemeal character of river and harbor appropriations and urging necessity of comprehensive plan. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 9, pp. 8435–8437.)

May 24, 1916: Debate, same subject, and also flood-control bill; protest against organization of National Waterways Commission in March, 1909; investigation should now be followed by the actual work of construction. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 9, pp. 8568–8572.)

May 26, 1916: Remarks: Shafroth amendment requiring 20 per cent contribution from States on river and harbor improvements. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 9, pp. 8703–8705.)

May 26, 1916: Introduced river-regulation amendment to river and harbor bill, H. R. 12193, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 9, p. 8729.)

May 27, 1916: River-regulation amendment offered, the river and harbor bill being under consideration:

"Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to offer the same amendment that was offered and put into the river and harbor bill some three years ago regarding the creation of a river regulation commission with powers of coordination and cooperation. * * *

"Mr. CLARKE (chairman of the Commerce Committee). I trust that the Senate will permit the amendment to be adopted without comment. * * *"

The amendment was read and appears in full in the RECORD of this date on page 8763. The point of order being made against the amendment that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill, the amendment was temporarily withdrawn. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 9, p. 8763.)

May 29, 1916: River-regulation amendment again offered, with the following remarks:

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I renew the amendment I offered the other day, an amendment which was inserted in the river and harbor bill some two years ago by the Senate. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 9, p. 8832.)

The amendment was subsequently stricken out on a reserved point of order. (See p. 8835.)

May 31, 1916: Debate as to reference of flood-control bill, H. R. 14777: An act to provide for the control of floods in the Mississippi and Sacramento Rivers; relation of flood control to waterway transportation. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 9, pp. 8953–8957.)

August 1, 1916: Remarks prompted by floods in Alabama, North and South Carolina. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 53, pt. 12, p. 11908.)

December 21, 1916: Introduced a bill (S. 7510) providing for the control of waterways and water resources, for water conservation, for flood control, prevention and protection. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 54, pt. 1, p. 635.)

February 10, 1917: Remarks:

"Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to ask of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce whether there is reported in the river and harbor bill a provision for the organization of a waterways commission, composed of departmental chiefs and distinguished engineers who are to make a thorough study of all the questions that relate to the development of our waterways for navigation and other purposes?"

The chairman of the Commerce Committee replied that such provision had been embodied in the bill, and the amendment (the river-regulation amendment) is printed on page 2990 of the RECORD. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 54, pt. 3, pp. 2889–2890.)

February 26, 1917: Debate: Mississippi and Sacramento Rivers flood-control bill, on the passage of the bill. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 54, pt. 3, pp. 4282, 4290, 4292, 4294, 4298.)

THE NEWLANDS RIVER-REGULATION AMENDMENT.

The first Newlands river-regulation amendment was introduced in the Senate as an amendment to the river and harbor bill by Senator NEWLANDS, on February 16, 1910, and on February 18 was reintroduced by him, with a brief amendment, and is printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the latter date.

At that time Senator NEWLANDS addressed the Senate on the subject of this amendment, and from his remarks the following is quoted:

"THE WATERWAY PROPAGANDA.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the question of the development of the waterways of the country has been receiving great attention within the past few years. Various organizations have been formed throughout the country relating to the development of our waterways, associations appropriately named for the promotion of such development in the Mississippi Valley, on the various tributaries of the Mississippi, on the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Gulf coasts. This movement reached such headway through conventions and river and harbor congresses that Mr. Roosevelt, then President, took the matter in hand and appointed a commission in aid of his power of recommendation to Congress, called "the Inland Waterways Commission," which made a preliminary report to him, which report was subsequently submitted to Congress.

"It was my privilege to serve on that commission, and whilst a member of it I introduced a bill, Senate bill No. 500, in the Sixtieth Congress, first session, for the organization of an inland waterway commission, for the coordination of the various scientific services of the Government that related in any way to the development of our waterways and water resources, and for cooperation between the Nation and the States, municipalities, and private interests in the development of these waterways. That bill, with certain modifications, was approved by the then Secretary of War and by the Inland Waterway Commission, of which Mr. Burton, of Ohio, was the chairman. It was referred to the Commerce Committee and there considered. But it did not come up for passage.

"Since then Congress itself took the matter in hand and appointed a National Waterway Commission, composed entirely of Senators and Representatives, the previous Inland Waterway Commission appointed by the President under his executive power of recommendation being a mixed commission, consisting of two Senators, two Members of the House of Representatives, and five others—the Chief of the Engineer Corps of the Army, the Chief of the Reclamation Service, the Chief of the Forestry Service, the Chief of the Bureau of Soils, and the Chief of the Bureau of Corporations.

"Both these commissions have agreed substantially upon the lines of their recommendation as to legislation. They have declared for coordination of the scientific and constructive services of the Government in this great work and for the cooperation of the Nation with States, municipalities, corporations, and individuals that have any jurisdiction over or any right or interest in the development of our waterways, the purpose being to unite the information, the experience, of the scientific services of the Government, and to unite the energies of all the various sovereignties and of all the corporations and individuals having jurisdiction over or interest in the water resources of the country in developing our waterways, not only for navigation, but for every other useful purpose.

"THE RELATED USES OF WATER.

"Mr. President, I imagine that there will be little difference of opinion that these related questions of forestry, of the reclamation of arid lands, of the drainage of swamp lands, of the development of water power, and the clarification of streams, all have a relation to the development of waterways for the purpose of navigation. The development of a waterway for navigation may be entirely impracticable because of its cost; but if we can unite with the development of that waterway the reclamation of the arid lands above, the drainage of swamp lands below, and the intermediate development of valuable water power, we then add to the natural resources of the country and create values which in themselves will be compensatory of the entire work, whereas the work would not be in any measure self-compensatory if confined to navigation alone.

"We have in this Government various scientific services, services of a very high standard, services of great esprit de corps, services that have won the admiration and respect not only of Congress, but of the entire country. These services are now acting entirely separate and apart from each other, and yet they are all practically acting upon parts of the same subject matter.

"We have the Engineer Corps of the Army operating simply upon the question of navigation. Their efforts thus far have been largely confined simply to the maintenance of a stable channel through the operations of dredging and bank protection. We have the Reclamation Service engaged in the diversion of the flood waters of the upper reaches of streams, carrying those flood waters over the arid lands, and thus aiding in the prevention of the extraordinary floods which impair the efficiency of the channel of the river below. We have in them an agency for flood prevention and for the storage of the flood waters which will aid and promote navigation. Then, we have below vast areas of swamp land, rich with alluvial soil, the deposits of ages, almost useless because of the annual overflow, and the channel of the river itself so scattered and diverse as not to permit navigation anywhere.

"The problem there is to make one navigable channel by bank protection and by bank levees, and by one process thus clear the channel for navigation and at the same time promote the reclamation of vast areas of rich and fertile land. So, also, in the development of our works for navigation we are compelled in places to provide for dams and locks in the rapids of the river where there is a rapid fall, and those dams and locks are useful for the development of water power, which in itself is partly compensatory of the project.

"We have, then, the Reclamation Service; we have the Forestry Service; we have the Weather Service; we have the Soils Service; we have the Coast and Geodetic Survey; and we have the Geological Survey, all of them engaged in the study of questions relating to water, its development, and its regulation and control. Is it not the businesslike thing to provide some method by which those services can be brought together for consultation and joint action?

"The purpose of this amendment is to permit the President of the United States to bring into coordination, through a board or boards, these related services; to bring them into coordination with the Corps of Engineers of the Army, leaving that as the central organization in connection with the development of our waterways, as it has been for so many years, but giving it the benefit of the advice and the accumulated experience and information of these great services which have been making a study of similar subjects.

"WATER AND RAIL COOPERATION.

"Then there is the question of transportation. The National Waterways Commission in its very elaborate and able report presents the question of the development of our waterways in connection with railways, insisting that the decline of waterway transportation thus far has been due to the fact that the railways have discouraged water transportation and have sought by unfair competition to destroy it. So, in connection with this great work, we should be allowed the opportunity of calling upon the great transportation experts of the country, and also the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission themselves, for the purpose of advising this board, or these boards, regarding methods that will bring water and rail into cooperation and make each the friend and ally instead of the enemy of the other.

"TRANSPORTATION A CHARGE ON OUR NATURAL RESOURCES.

"The railroad managers have declared that it is essential, in order to meet the transportation requirements of the country in the near future, that at least $5,000,000,000 shall be expended upon the railways of the country. That $5,000,000,000 is a charge upon the natural resources of the country, as is so well stated in the report of the national commission. The interest upon it, amounting to at least $250,000,000 annually, will be paid by the shippers of the country, and is it not a wise thing for us to consider whether we can not reduce in part the necessity for such enormous expenditure by spending within the next 10 years $500,000,000, and even perhaps a billion dollars in the aggregate? It is reasonable to suppose that the expenditure of a billion dollars in waterway transportation at the rate of $100,000,000 a year during the next 10 years will save more than half of the necessary expenditure of $5,000,000,000 upon the railways.

"Why is it that the railways have been unequal to the transportation requirements of the country? Why was it that two or three years ago they broke down just before the panic? It was simply because the railroads were made the agencies of transporting the bulky and cheap products of the country, products which could be better and more cheaply carried by water, and in reference to the transportation of which time was not an essential. Inquire of any railroad man, and you will find that the breaking down of the transportation system of the country was not due to the transportation of the high-priced products, which pay high freight, but to the coarser products, the products of the mine, the products of the field and the farm, such products as in Germany are carried mainly by waterway transportation, and which in this country, if we perfect our waterway transportation, can be carried largely upon the rivers of the country; so that it is important for us to act now and to establish the system under which we are to proceed.

"The amendment which I have offered, whilst not going so far as I would desire to do, as indicated in my appendix to the report of the Inland Waterways Commission, goes as far as the judgment of Congress will at present sanction; but I believe that, so far as providing for coordination of the scientific services of the country, providing for comprehensive plans, and for cooperation between the Nation and the States is concerned, Congress will readily see the propriety of this amendment. Then we will have enlisted not only the information and experience of the Engineer Corps of the Army, but the information and experience of every scientific service of the Government and the services of the best engineers, constructors, and transportation experts of the country in the solution of these important problems; and we can enter upon this great work with comprehensive plans, assigning to each sovereign its duty, to each interest its duty, properly apportioning costs and benefits, instead of entering upon an accidental and disjointed development, which may result, I fear, in the shipwreck of the waterway movement of the country."

"THE GOVERNORS' CONFERENCE.

"If you will read the report of the conference of the governors, unanimously acquiesced in by the governors of the great States, you will find the principles of coordination and of cooperation, such as are outlined in this amendment clearly sustained and vindicated.

"I quote from the declaration of the governors, as follows:

"We declare our firm conviction that this conservation of our natural resources is a subject of transcendent importance, which should engage unremittingly the attention of the Nation, the States, and the people in earnest cooperation. These natural resources include the land on which we live and which yields our food; the living waters which fertilize the soil, supply power, and form great avenues of commerce; the forests which yield the materials for our homes, prevent erosion of the soil, and conserve the navigation and other uses of the streams; and the minerals which form the basis of our industrial life, and supply us with heat, light, and power.

"We agree that the land should be so used that erosion and soil wash shall cease; and that there should be reclamation of arid and semiarid regions by means of irrigation, and of swamp and overflowed regions by means of drainage; that the waters should be so conserved and used as to promote navigation, to enable the arid regions to be reclaimed by irrigation, and to develop power in the interests of the people; that the forests which regulate our rivers, support our industries, and promote the fertility and productiveness of the soil should be preserved and perpetuated; that the minerals found so abundantly beneath the surface should be so used as to prolong their utility; that the beauty, healthfulness, and habitability of our country should be preserved and increased; that the sources of national wealth exist for the benefit of the people, and that monopoly thereof should not be tolerated.

"We commend the wise forethought of the President in sounding the note of warning as to the waste and exhaustion of the natural resources of the country, and signify our high appreciation of his action in calling this conference to consider the same and to seek remedies therefor through cooperation of the Nation and the States.

"We agree that this cooperation should find expression in suitable action by the Congress within the limits of and coextensive with the national jurisdiction of the subject, and, complementary thereto, by the legislatures of the several States within the limits of and coextensive with their jurisdiction.

"We declare the conviction that in the use of the national resources our independent States are interdependent and bound together by ties of mutual benefits, responsibilities, and duties.

"We recognize in our waters a most valuable asset of the people of the United States, and we recommend the enactment of laws looking to the conservation of water resources for irrigation, water supply, power, and navigation, to the end that navigable and source streams may be brought under complete control and fully utilized for every purpose. We especially urge on the Federal Congress the immediate adoption of a wise, active, and thorough waterway policy, providing for the prompt improvement of our streams and the conservation of their watersheds required for the uses of commerce and the protection of the interests of our people."

The Newlands river-regulation amendment was agreed to by the Senate as an amendment to the river and harbor bill on February 23, 1913, but was stricken out in conference, as will be seen by reference to the debates in the Senate on the river and harbor bill on March 1, 1913. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 49, pt. 5, pp. 4365–4376, 4380, 4427–4428.)

On June 22, 1914, Senator NEWLANDS again introduced the river-regulation amendment, and from his remarks in the Senate at that time the following is quoted:

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the river and harbor appropriation bill, and I desire to make a brief statement in connection therewith.

"Ever since 1907 I have been urging the adoption of a river-regulation bill, providing a commission with a fund of $60,000,000 annually for 10 years, for the purpose of promoting the development and control of our rivers in the interest of irrigation, and also with a view to the solution of the related questions of irrigation, forestry, fisheries, swamp-land reclamation, flood control, water-power development, cooperation of railways and waterways, and promotion of transfer facilities and sites. Two years ago I succeeded in placing an amendment upon the river and harbor bill in the Senate providing for the skeleton organization covered by this bill, but the amendment was lost in conference because of the opposition of the House conferees. Since then, as the result of conferences with Senator RANSDELL and Senator-elect BROUSSARD, of Louisiana, the bill has been amended by fully recognizing the Mississippi River as a national problem, and the bill now has the active cooperation of these gentlemen, Mr. BROUSSARD having recently introduced it in the House. The bill is now known as the Newlands-Broussard bill.

"Early in the present administration the President's attention was called to the bill as a substantial compliance with the Democratic platforms of the past two campaigns, calling in the most specific terms for comprehensive plans, an ample fund, the coordination of the scientific services, and the cooperation of the Nation with the States in the full development and control of our rivers for every useful purpose. The President was much interested, and referred the bill to a Cabinet committee consisting of the Secretaries of War, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce for their study and report. This Cabinet committee is very favorably inclined toward the general lines of the bill, but recommends as a step in the ultimate solution of the problem the adoption of an amendment to the river and harbor bill practically on the lines of the amendment offered by me two years ago and adopted in the Senate. The matter has been the subject of discussion at a Cabinet meeting, and the President approves of this action.

"The most important difference between this amendment and the full bill is that it does not carry the large and continuing appropriation for which the advocates of a comprehensive plan of waterway development have been working. It does, however, provide complete machinery for the coordination of the scientific services of the Government, for the study of the problems involved, and for the formulation of plans. The amendment has the approval of the Secretaries of the departments named, as well as of the President, and is acceptable to me as a step in the right direction, although it does not go as far as I had hoped it might be carried. It is my belief that upon such a substantial foundation, with the cordial cooperation of the administration, it will be a question of only a comparatively short time until the problem of how to conserve our water resources will be solved in the best possible way.

"I ask that the amendment be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce."

There being no objection, the amendment was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"SEC. —. That a commission, to be known as the river-regulation commission, consisting of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, two Members of the Senate to be selected by the President of the Senate, and two Members of the House of Representatives to be selected by the Speaker, is hereby created and authorized to investigate questions relating to the development, improvement, regulation, and control of navigation as a part of interstate and foreign commerce, including therein the related questions of irrigation, forestry, fisheries, swamp-land reclamation, clarification of streams, regulation of flow, control of floods, utilization of water power, prevention of soil waste, cooperation of railways and waterways, and promotion of transfer facilities and sites, and to formulate, if practicable, and to report to the Congress comprehensive plans for the development of the waterways and water resources of the country for every useful purpose through cooperation between the United States and the several States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals within the jurisdiction, powers, and rights of each, respectively, assigning to the United States such portion of such development, promotion, regulation, and control, if any, as can be properly undertaken by the United States by virtue of its power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce and by reason of its proprietary interest in the public domain, and to States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals such portion, if any, as properly belongs to their jurisdiction, rights, and interests, with a view to properly apportioning costs and benefits, and with a view to so uniting the plans and works of the United States within its jurisdiction, and of the States and municipalities, respectively, within their jurisdictions, and of corporations, communities, and individuals within their respective powers and rights, as to secure the highest development and utilization of the waterways and water resources of the United States. Such river-regulation commission is authorized, for the purpose of said investigation and report, to bring into coordination and cooperation with the Corps of Engineers of the Army, as a board or boards, the other scientific or constructive services of the United States that relate to the study, development, and control of waterways and water resources and subjects related thereto, and to the development and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, and to consider as a part of its study of a comprehensive plan the continuance of such a board or of such boards with a view to keeping such services in coordination and cooperation; and such river-regulation commission is authorized to appoint as members of such board or boards such engineers, transportation experts, experts in water development, constructors, and other employees as it may deem advisable to appoint and employ in connection with the investigation and the formulation of plans herein authorized, and to lease offices. And for the expenses of such investigation, organization, and formulation of plans the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated."

The river-regulation amendment finally passed by Congress on August 3, 1917, and which became a law by the signature of the President on August 8, 1917, is section 18 of H. R. 4285, an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," Public, No. 37, Sixty-fifth Congress, is as follows:

"SEC. 18. That a commission, to be known as the Waterways Commission, consisting of seven members to be appointed by the President of the United States, at least one of whom shall be chosen from the active or retired list of the Engineer Corps of the Army, at least one of whom shall be an expert hydraulic engineer from civil life, and the remaining five of whom may each be selected either from civil life or the public service, is hereby created and authorized, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, and subject to the approval of the heads of the several executive departments concerned, to bring into coordination and cooperation the engineering, scientific, and constructive services, bureaus, boards, and commissions of the several governmental departments of the United States and commissions created by Congress that relate to study, development, or control of waterways and water resources and subjects related thereto, or to the development and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, with a view to uniting such services in investigating, with respect to all watersheds in the United States, questions relating to the development, improvement, regulation, and control of navigation as a part of interstate and foreign commerce, including therein the related questions of irrigation, drainage, forestry, arid and swamp land reclamation, clarification of streams, regulation of flow, control of floods, utilization of water power, prevention of soil erosion and waste, storage, and conservation of water for agricultural, industrial, municipal, and domestic uses, cooperation of railways and waterways, and promotion of terminal and transfer facilities, to secure the necessary data, and to formulate and report to Congress as early as practicable a comprehensive plan or plans for the development of waterways and the water resources of the United States for the purposes of navigation and for every useful purpose, and recommendations for the modification or discontinuance of any project herein or heretofore adopted. Any member appointed from the retired list shall receive the same pay and allowances as he would if on the active list, and no member selected from the public service shall receive additional compensation for services on said commission, and members selected from civil life shall receive compensation of $7,500 per annum.

"In all matters done, or to be done, under this section relating to any of the subjects, investigations, or questions to be considered hereunder, and in formulating plans, and in the preparation of a report or reports, as herein provided, consideration shall be given to all matters which are to be undertaken, either independently by the United States or by cooperation between the United States and the several States, political subdivisions thereof, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals within the jurisdiction, powers, and rights of each, respectively, and with a view to assigning to the United States such portion of such development, promotion, regulation, and control as may be undertaken by the United States, and to the States, political subdivisions thereof, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals such portions as belong to their respective jurisdictions, rights, and interests.

"The commission is authorized to employ or retain and fix the compensation for the services of such engineers, transportation experts, experts in water development and utilization, and constructors of eminence as it may deem necessary to make such investigations and to carry out the purposes of this section. And in order to defray the expenses made necessary by the provisions of this section there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as Congress may hereafter determine, and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, available until expended, to be paid out upon warrants drawn on the Secretary of the Treasury by the chairman of said commission.

"The commission shall have power to make every expenditure requisite for and incident to its authorized work, and to employ in the District of Columbia and in the field such clerical, legal, engineering, artistic, and expert services as it may deem advisable, including the payment of per diem in lieu of subsistence for employees engaged in field work or traveling on official business, rent of offices in the District of Columbia and in the field, and the purchase of books, maps, and office equipment.

"Nothing herein contained shall be construed to delay, prevent, or interfere with the completion of any survey, investigation, project, or work herein or heretofore or hereafter adopted or authorized upon or for the improvement of any of the rivers or harbors of the United States or with legislative action upon reports heretofore or hereafter presented."

The following is a copy of S. 5736, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, introduced April 24, 1916, by Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS with a view to embodying it in the Newlands river-regulation bill, the recommendations of the Interdepartmental Cabinet Committee and the Interdepartmental Committee of Service Chiefs, appointed by President Wilson:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $60,000,000, to be apportioned as hereinafter provided, is hereby reserved, set aside, appropriated, and made available until expended, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, as a special fund in the Treasury, to be known as the "river-regulation fund," to be used to promote interstate commerce by the development and improvement of the rivers and waterways of the United States and their connections with the Great Lakes and with each other, and by the coordination of and cooperation between rail and water routes and transportation, and the establishment and maintenance of adequate terminal and transfer facilities and systems, and their maintenance, improvement, and protection, and by the making of examinations and surveys and by the construction of engineering and other works and projects for the regulation and control of the flow of rivers and their tributaries and source streams, and the standardization of such flow, and by the maintenance of navigable stages of water at all seasons of the year in the waterways of the United States, and by preventing silt and sedimentary material from being carried into and deposited in waterways, channels, and harbors, and by the conservation, development, and utilization of the water resources of the United States, and by flood prevention and protection, through the establishment, construction, and maintenance of natural and artificial reservoirs and detention basins for water storage and control, and levees, revetments, and other bank-protective works, spillways, wastewiers, wasteways, bypasses, controlled outlets, and flood-control works of every nature and kind, and the protection of watersheds from denudation, erosion, and surface wash, and from forest fires, and the maintenance and extension of woodland and other protective cover thereon, and the reclamation of swamp and overflow lands and arid lands, and the building of drainage and irrigation works in order that the flow of rivers shall be regulated and controlled not only through the use of flood waters for irrigation on the upper tributaries, but also through controlling them in fixed and established channels in the lower valleys and plains, and by doing all things necessary to provide for any and all beneficial uses of water that will contribute to its conservation or storage in the ground or in surface reservoirs as an aid to the regulation or control of the flow of rivers, and by acquiring, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, holding, using, leasing, hiring, and transferring by appropriate deed lands and any other property that may be needed for the aforesaid purposes, or which it may be deemed advisable to dispose of, and by doing such other things as may be specified in this act or necessary to the accomplishment of the purposes thereof, and by securing the cooperation therein of States, municipalities, and other local agencies, as hereinafter set forth, and for the payment of all expenditures provided for in this act.

"(a) Twenty-five million dollars to the Illinois River and its watershed and to the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Illinois to the Head of the Passes, including the Atchafalaya River as one of the mouths of the Mississippi River, to be expended for the improvement of the Illinois River and for continuing the improvement of the Mississippi River from the Head of the Passes to the mouth of the Illinois River, for the control of floods thereon, and the establishment of a waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf; (b) $5,000,000 to the watersheds of the Ohio River and its tributaries, for the control of floods thereon, and the consequent improvement of navigation; (c) $5,000,000 to the watershed of the Mississippi River above the mouth of the Illinois River; (d) $5,000,000 to the watersheds of the Missouri River and all other tributaries of the Mississippi River, except the Ohio, from the mouth of the Illinois River to the Gulf, and all rivers draining into the Gulf of Mexico west of the Mississippi River; (e) $5,000,000 to the watersheds of the rivers draining into Canada, the Great Lakes, and the Atlantic Ocean and rivers draining into the Gulf of Mexico east of the Mississippi River; (f) $5,000,000 to the watersheds of all the rivers draining into the Pacific Ocean in Oregon and Washington, including the Columbia River watershed; (g) $5,000,000 to the watersheds of the rivers draining into the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys and into the Pacific Ocean north of Santa Barbara, in California; (h) $5,000,000 to the watersheds of all other rivers in California and the Great Inland Basin and the Colorado River.

"NATIONAL WATERWAYS COUNCIL.

"SEC. 2. That a national waterways council, hereinafter called the council, is hereby created, consisting of the President of the United States as chairman, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the chairman of the water-control board, to be appointed as hereinafter provided.

"The council shall have authority to direct and control all proceedings and operations and all things done or to be done under this act, and to establish all rules and regulations which may, in their judgment, be necessary to carry into effect such direction and control consistent with the provisions of this act and with existing law and with any provisions which Congress may from time to time enact.

"All plans and estimates prepared by the water-control board, as hereinafter provided, which contemplate or provide for expenditures from the river-regulation fund shall be submitted to the council for final approval before any of the expenditures therein provided for or contemplated are authorized or made or any construction work undertaken or contracts let under or in pursuance of such plans: Provided, That in case of an emergency the chairman of the water-control board shall have full power to act, and shall report in detail his action in every case to the council at its next meeting after his action.

"WATER-CONTROL BOARD.

"SEC. 3. That to assist in carrying out the purposes aforesaid the council may utilize the various agencies of the Government, and there is hereby created a water-control board, hereinafter called the board, which shall consist of a chairman, to be appointed by the council, and four assistant secretaries, to be appointed as hereinafter provided, and such additional members as the council may from time to time appoint. The chairman of the board shall receive a salary of $12,000 per annum, each assistant secretary aforesaid shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum, and said additional members of the board such salaries as the council may from time to time fix. Subject to the direction and control of the council as to general policy and procedure, it shall be the duty of the board to ascertain in detail the work in progress and obtain plans, recommendations, and estimates of the work contemplated in the general field of water conservation, control, and utilization by the various agencies of the Government, States, counties, municipalities, districts, communities, corporations, associations, and individuals, and on the basis of such information and the results obtained by its own surveys and investigations to prepare for the consideration of the council a general and comprehensive program of water and waterways conservation, regulation, development, and utilization, extending through a number of years, with comprehensive general plans for each watershed, treating the entire watershed of each river as a unit, and with specific projects, plans, estimates, and recommendations, involving independent work by the United States and the combining of resources and energies of the various public and private agencies aforesaid; to coordinate and bring into conference the various agencies of the Government; and to examine, compare, adjust, allot, assign, and supervise their work, to the end that duplication may be avoided and the highest efficiency obtained; by agreement to assign to the various cooperating agencies the work to be done by them within their respective spheres; to accept, on behalf of the United States, from such agencies contributions of money and property of any kind to be used for carrying out the purposes authorized by this act; to make field inspection of all work done or contemplated under this act by the Government and its cooperating agencies; and to employ such engineers, transportation experts, experts in water development, constructors, and other employees, and to construct such buildings and works as may be necessary for those purposes. The board is hereby authorized to expend from the sums herein provided such amounts as may be necessary for services of employees in the city of Washington, D. C., and elsewhere; to pay therefrom such sums as may be necessary for office accommodations in the city of Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, and to purchase such law books, books of reference, periodicals, engineering, statistical, and professional publications as may be needed. Contributions received under this section shall be used by the board, under the direction of the council, for carrying out the purposes of this act, and money so received shall be paid into the river-regulation fund herein created. Subject to the approval of the council, the board is authorized to enter into such contracts or carry on by hired labor or otherwise such work as may be necessary for carrying out the purposes of this act, within the limits of appropriations made or authorized by this act or appropriations or contributions which shall be hereafter made or authorized from time to time, or as may be necessary for executing projects under this act within the respective limits of cost thereof approved by the Congress, the funds for which shall have been provided by the Secretary of the Treasury in accordance with the authority conferred by this act. Subject to the approval of the council the board may also employ the various agencies of the Government in carrying out such purposes or executing such projects.

"COOPERATION WITH STATES AND OTHER AGENCIES.

"SEC. 4. That the board shall, in all cases where possible and practicable, encourage, promote, and endeavor to secure the cooperation of States, municipalities, public and quasi public corporations, towns, counties, districts, communities, persons, and associations in the carrying out of the purposes and objects of this act, and in making the investigations and doing all coordinative and constructive work provided for herein; and it shall in each case endeavor to secure the financial cooperation of States and of such local authorities, agencies, and organizations to such extent and in such amounts as the council shall determine to be a just and equitable apportionment of work, costs, and benefits under all the circumstances in each case; and it shall negotiate and perfect arrangements and plans for the apportionment of work, cost, and benefits, according to the jurisdiction, powers, rights, and benefits of each, respectively, and with a view to assigning to the United States such portion of such development, promotion, regulation, and control as can be properly undertaken by the United States by virtue of its power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce and promote the general welfare, and by reason of its proprietary interest in the public domain, and to the States, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals such portion as properly belongs to their jurisdiction, rights, and interests, and with a view to properly apportioning costs and benefits, and with a view to so uniting the plans and works of the United States within its jurisdiction, and of the States and municipalities, respectively, within their jurisdictions, and of corporations, communities, and individuals within their respective powers and rights, as to secure the highest development and utilization of the waterways and water resources of the United States.

"APPOINTMENT OF WATER-CONTROL BOARD.

"SEC. 5. That each head of a department named in this act is authorized to appoint, with the approval of the council, for service as a member of the board, a highly qualified representative, who shall be an assistant secretary in the department in which he is appointed; shall devote his time primarily to the work authorized by this act; shall have, subject to the direction of the head of the department, such general supervision and control as may be necessary for the purposes of this act of the agencies within the department engaged upon such work; shall serve during good service and behavior; and shall be removable by the head of the department only for good cause.

"RIVER-REGULATION FUND.

"SEC. 6. That no sums shall be paid out of the river-regulation fund except on vouchers signed by the chairman of the board or by an official designated by him in writing, drawn on the Secretary of the Treasury. To provide for carrying out the projects formulated under this act, which involve expenditures in excess of the $60,000,000 herein appropriated to the river-regulation fund, the appropriation hereafter to the credit of said fund of such sums as may be necessary is hereby authorized. At any time that the Secretary of the Treasury shall determine it to be necessary or advisable, in order to provide all or any part of the appropriation made or authorized by this act or which may be hereafter made or authorized or to provide revenues to execute a project under this act, which shall have been approved by the Congress, he may issue and sell, or use as a means of borrowing money, bonds in the necessary amount, in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 5, 1909 (36th Stats. L., pp. 11, 117), the act of February 4, 1910 (36th Stats. L., 192), and the act of March 2, 1911 (36th Stats. L., p. 1013). The sums appropriated or provided by the Secretary of the Treasury pursuant to this section shall be paid into the river-regulation fund and shall be available until expended and paid out as provided for in this act. All moneys received in connection with any operations under this act as well as from the sales of materials utilized and any condemned property shall be covered into the 'river-regulation fund' and be available for expenditure therefrom. It is the intent and purpose of this act to authorize and empower the council and the board and their officers, agents, and employees to do all necessary acts and things in addition to those specially authorized in this act to accomplish the purposes and objects hereof."

LEADING MEASURES INTRODUCED AND PASSED.

The following is a reference to the leading measures which have been introduced by Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS at different times, from which the present river-regulation measure, section 18 of the river and harbor act of 1917, has been developed:

The Newlands national irrigation bill, officially designated after its enactment as the United States Reclamation Act: H. R. 9674, introduced January 21, 1902.

The inland waterways commission bills: S. 500, introduced December 6, 1907, and S. 3717, introduced December 10, 1909.

Amendment to S. 4501, the White Mountain and Appalachian National Forest bill: Introduced June 23, 1910.

The Newlands river-regulation bill: S. 10900, introduced March 1, 1911; S. 122, introduced April 6, 1911; S. 2739, introduced July 14, 1913.

The Newlands-Broussard river-regulation bill, introduced as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for S. 2739, introduced January 31, 1914.

The Newlands river-regulation bill, providing for a national waterways council and a water-control board, to conform to recommendations of the interdepartmental committee: S. 5736, introduced April 24, 1916.

The Newlands reclamation act, known before its passage as the Newlands national irrigation bill, was passed by Congress on June 13, 1902, and was signed by President Roosevelt and became a law on June 17, 1902.

The river-regulation act, section 18 of the river and harbor act of 1917, known before its passage as the Newlands river-regulation amendment, was passed by Congress on August 2, 1917, and was signed by President Wilson and became a law on August 8, 1917.

The original Newlands river-regulation bill, S. 10900, was printed in full in the report of the flood commission of Pittsburgh, pages 391 to 396, and in a public document containing the remarks of Senator NEWLANDS in the Senate on Wednesday, February 15, 1911, on the passage on that day of the Appalachian and White Mountain Forest Reserve bill.

The Newlands-Broussard river-regulation bill, amendment to S. 2739, was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 51, part 3, pages 2635–2638, and also in Senate Document No. 418, Sixty-third Congress, second session.

The last Newlands river-regulation bill, embodying the recommendations of the interdepartmental committee, and providing for a national waterways council and water-control board, as recommended in that report, was printed in full in Senate Document No. 550, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, and has been hereinbefore reprinted in full in this historical statement.

CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS.

At every stage of its progress this great national movement for the conservation, development, and complete utilization of the water resources of the United States has been opposed on the ground that it was an unconstitutional and unwarranted enlargement of the functions of the National Government, and the measures which Congress has finally adopted have each settled some one particular phase of this advancement of the sphere of governmental action.

The Newlands reclamation act settled forever the right and obligation of the Government of the United States to construct works for the conservation and utilization of the surplus waters in the western half of the United States.

The White Mountain and Appalachian National Forest Reserve act went further, and settled the question as to the range and scope of the activities of the Federal Government on the watersheds of the navigable rivers. It established the principle that the constitutional power and obligation of the National Government extends to the source of every tributary stream feeding a navigable river, and to the doing of any and all things that may be essential to control and regulate the flow of that river and all its source streams, so as to standardize their flow, so far as practicable, throughout the year. The act provides only for forestry methods of accomplishing this object; but if forestry is within its powers and obligations, there is no reason why all practicable methods of accomplishing the same result are not equally within the powers and obligations of the National Government, such as the building of artificial surface reservoirs, as advocated by the flood commission of Pittsburgh, or the conservation by storage in the ground of waters used for agricultural purposes.

The Mississippi and Sacramento Rivers flood-control act again extended the recognized powers and obligations of the National Government to the protection of lands from overflow and flood devastation by engineering works built for that purpose, without any necessary justification for their construction, on the ground that such construction was warranted by their benefit to navigation, as had previously been contended.

And now the river-regulation amendment, section 18 of the river and harbor bill of 1917, has practically and substantially declared that the powers authorized in the three bills above mentioned shall be extended to and cover the whole field of the conservation, development, and utilization of all the water resources of the United States, for every useful and beneficial purpose for which those waters can be used, and upon every watershed in the United States.

The Newlands reclamation act of June 17, 1902, was only a single stepping stone to this complete and comprehensive policy; the White Mountain and Appalachian Forest Reserve act was another stepping stone; the Mississippi and Sacramento Rivers flood-control act was another; and now Congress has, after a campaign always having that ultimate object in view, and extending over more than a quarter of a century, unequivocally placed the authority and powers and obligations of the National Government in this broad field upon a Nation-wide, enduring, and comprehensive foundation that will in its eventual working out save from waste "the Nation's greatest asset," the surplus and now unused waters of the United States.

THE EDUCATIONAL CAMPAIGN.

The educational campaign that has steadfastly pushed forward this broad and beneficial national policy has been conducted through several different organizations, the oldest being the National Irrigation Congress and the American Forestry Association.

The National Irrigation Congress declared for the national irrigation policy at some of its earliest sessions and squarely put its demands before the people at the seventh national irrigation congress held at Phoenix, Ariz., in 1896, and was unfaltering in its support of that policy until it was adopted by Congress in June, 1902, by the enactment of the reclamation act.

The American Forestry Association championed the White Mountain and Appalachian National Forest Reserve bill, organized a national campaign in its behalf, and marshaled the forces that fought for that bill through a period of fully 10 years, until it was finally enacted by Congress in February, 1911.

The National Reclamation Association was organized as the National Irrigation Association on June 3, 1899, for the purpose of conducting a Nation-wide campaign for the entire broad national policy advocated in the statement of the objects of the association, as set forth in its constitution, as follows:

[The National Reclamation Association, organized as the Nation's Irrigation Association June 2, 1899.]

"OBJECTS.

"1. The adoption by the Federal Government of a permanent policy for the reclamation and settlement of the public domain under which all the remaining public lands shall be held and administered as a trust for the benefit of the whole people of the United States, and no grants of title to any of the public lands shall ever hereafter be made to any but actual settlers and home builders on the land.

"2. The preservation and development of our national resources by the construction of storage reservoirs by the Federal Government for flood protection, and to save for use in aid of navigation and irrigation the flood waters which now run to waste and cause overflow and destruction.

"3. The construction by the Federal Government of storage reservoirs and irrigation works wherever necessary to furnish water for the reclamation and settlement of the arid public lands.

"4. The preservation of the forests and reforestation of denuded forest areas as sources of water supply, the conservation of existing supplies by approved methods of irrigation and distribution, and the increase of the water resources of the arid region by the investigation and development of underground supplies.

"5. The adoption of a harmonious system of irrigation laws in all the arid and semiarid States and Territories under which the right to the use of water for irrigation shall vest in the user, and become appurtenant to the land irrigated, and beneficial use be the basis and the measure and limit of the right.

"6. The dissemination by public meetings and through the press of information regarding irrigation, and the reclamation and settlement of the arid public domain, and the possibilities of better agriculture through irrigation and intensive farming, and the need for agricultural education and training, and the creation of rural homes as national safeguards, and the encouragement of rural settlement as a remedy for the social and political evils threatened by the congestion of population in large cities."

THE NEWLANDS RIVER-REGULATION BILL.

The National Reclamation Association of Louisiana was organized in January, 1912, with a view to subsequently merging it with the National Irrigation Association, which was done in January, 1913, and after the great flood of 1913 a statement was issued to the business men of the United States setting forth the reasons why the Newlands river-regulation bill should have the support of the business interests of the country.

That statement was as follows:

"To the Merchants and Manufacturers of the United States:

"The National Reclamation Association extends to you its greetings and urges your consideration of the following facts:

"There is not a merchant or manufacturer in the United States whose market is the country at large who did not suffer from loss of trade, delayed collections, or uncollectible accounts, with consequent loss of profits, as the result of the disastrous floods that devastated the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys in 1912 and 1913. These national catastrophies will continue to recur at frequent intervals in different parts of the country unless preventive measures are adopted by the National Government.

Is it not better that this be done without delay by prompt congressional action? Every year's delay means a continuation of this risk of enormous losses, which will be removed whenever the inertia of Congress has been overcome by an insistent demand from the business men of the country.

"You insure against fire loss by the payment of a premium to an insurance company or by cooperation with some plan for mutual insurance. Is it not good business policy for every merchant and manufacturer in the United States to cooperate with others, and by their mutual activity and insistent demand for immediate action by Congress secure the passage of the Newlands river-regulation bill at the next session? That bill provides flood insurance for all parts of the United States by providing for doing the things in this country that have been so successfully done in several European countries to prevent and protect against damage by floods. What other countries have done we can do. Not to do it is to court the eventual destruction that has finally been the fate of the countries of Asia and northern Africa that have neglected these national protective measures against the destructive forces of nature.

"The Newlands river-regulation bill creates a waterways commission and board of river regulation composed of the heads of the departments and bureaus of the National Government that are now at work on the problem of river regulation and control. It coordinates their work, provides for cocperation with States and local districts or municipalities, and then appropriates enough money for the work to actually get it done. The policy that built the Panama Canal and the national irrigation works in the West is applied by the Newlands bill to building works to harness and control the floods in all parts of the United States. The bill appropriates $60,000,000 a year for 10 years to do this work. That total appropriation of $600,000,000, covering 10 years of construction work, is less than the actual direct losses from floods within two years in the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys alone.

"The only way to deal with the flood problem is to treat every river from source to mouth, with all its tributaries, as a unit, and so far as possible slow up the run off, harness the floods at their sources by all practicable means, and restore nature's safeguards by providing controlled outlets and excess flood-water channels as well as levees, revetments, and local protective works. Levees alone can never be made an adequate protection against the extraordinary floods of the unusually heavy flood years, and any plan that contemplates 'levees only' as a remedy will in the end prove a delusion and a snare and worse than a waste of money.

"The Newlands river-regulation bill provides not only for levees but also for all other means for flood prevention and protection that are practicable and applicable to the particular section where they should be adopted. It covers the whole problem and it covers the entire country. It recognizes the necessity for flood protection and prevention and the equal right to such relief in all flood-menaced sections of the United States. The solution of this great problem demands that sectional selfishness be laid aside and the question dealt with nationally, under the constitutional power of Congress to aid navigation. The water that now goes to waste in floods must be conserved for beneficial use and turned into the river channels in the low-water season to float water-borne commerce.

"On the Mississippi River, which presents the largest problem, because this great river drains 41 per cent of the entire United States, the annual appropriations in the river and harbor bill should be enlarged from year to year as the value of this great national inland waterway becomes better appreciated and commerce thereon increases. The work done under the river and harbor bill, which is largely channel-improvement work, must be supplemented by source-stream control, bank-protective works, and a system of controlled outlets and excess flood-water channels, so as to regulate the flow of the river, lower the flood stages, and raise the low-water stages, as provided in the Newlands river-regulation bill. The floods that come from the West should be held back and used for irrigation and power development. The floods from the Ohio River should be controlled on the tributaries whence they come, and the water beneficially used, instead of sweeping down the valleys as a mighty agency of devastation and destruction.

"The Newlands river-regulation bill has been before the country for more than two years and is strongly supported by such organizations as the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce, Philadelphia Board of Trade, St. Louis Merchants' Exchange, National Irrigation Congress, National Lumber Manufacturers' Association, Associated Chambers of Commerce of the Pacific Coast, San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, Los Angeles Clearing House, Arizona and California River Regulation Commission, River Regulation Committee of Stockton, Cal., Texas Bankers' Association, Louisiana Bankers' Association, Southern Cypress Manufacturers' Association, National Slack Cooperage Association, Flood Commission of Pittsburgh, and many other similar organizations, and has Nation-wide support from the press.

"The active campaign for the passage of the bill by Congress is being conducted by the National Reclamation Association and the cooperation of every commercial and manufacturing concern and industrial institution in the United States is earnestly desired in order that the relief which this great constructive national legislative measure will bring to the entire business interests of the country and particularly to the flood-menaced sections may be expedited and the danger of a recurrence of past disasters safeguarded against without delay.

"NATIONAL RECLAMATION ASSOCIATION,
"R. H. DOWNMAN,
"Chairman of the Board.
"GEORGE H. MAXWELL,
"Executive Director.
"WALTER PARKER,
"Secretary."

The National Irrigation Association, now known as the National Reclamation Association, from the date of its organization in June, 1899, 18 years ago, up to the enactment of the United States reclamation act, in June, 1902, conducted one of the most far-reaching and vigorous campaigns of education ever conducted in the United States for the policy set forth in its constitution above set forth, and its efforts contributed largely to the success of the movement that brought about the final passage of the reclamation act on June 13, 1902.

The National Irrigation Association, in 1903, turned its attention again to the broader aspects of the national movement to which it was devoted, and the broad and comprehensive national policy embodied in the Newlands river-regulation bill was declared and indorsed in the following resolutions drawn by George H. Maxwell, and adopted as an expression of the broad western vision of what should be done to prevent the waste and destruction of our national resources and safeguard against the annually recurring menace of the floods:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT THE FOURTEENTH ANNUAL SESSION OF THE TRANS-MISSISSIPPI COMMERCIAL CONGRESS HELD AT SEATTLE, WASH., AUGUST 18–21, 1903.

"We are drawing from nature's treasure vaults the wealth that has been accumulating through the ages. That wealth is in our forests, our mines, and our farms. Their products are the basis of both our internal and our foreign trade and commerce, and the original source of all employment for labor.

"CONSERVE NATURAL RESOURCES.

"The unparalleled era of prosperity through which we are now passing results from the rapid development of the material resources of our country, and we must preserve those resources if we are to maintain that prosperity. We are drawing from Nature's treasure vaults the wealth that has been accumulating through the ages. That wealth is in our forests, our mines, and our farms. Their products are the basis of both our internal and our foreign trade and commerce, and the original source of all employment for labor.

"This mighty resource of natural wealth must not be wasted or destroyed. Not only should the natural resources of the Trans-Mississippi region be systematically preserved but the home markets for its products should be protected.

"We have a higher destiny as a Nation than the mere creation or accumulation of capital. We must preserve and bequeath to future generations the natural resources which will be necessary to their material welfare, and without which in the years to come, the masses of our people will inevitably be reduced to poverty, and suffer privation and distress.

"WHAT MUST BE DONE.

"We may use and enjoy these vast natural resources without destroying them, and by a wise governmental policy they may be enormously developed and enlarged. But if this is to be done:

"1. The appalling ravages from forest fires must be stopped.

"2. The reckless destruction of our timber resources by careless and wasteful methods of lumbering must cease.

"3. The forests must be preserved by right use, not only as a permanent source of supply for wood and timber but as sources of water supply and great natural reservoirs to hold back the flood waters and lessen the destructive volume of floods.

"4. The waters that now run to waste must be stored both for flood protection and for use in irrigation and to create electric power and for the improvement of navigation.

"5. Reservoirs should be built throughout the mountain regions, and wherever practicable in the natural depressions and basins of the great plains in the valleys of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers and their tributaries.

"6. The building of a multitude of small reservoirs and ponds by damming the draws and coulees should be brought about.

"7. The river channels should be, wherever necessary, deepened, straightened, and improved, and the banks protected by revetments.

"8. Levees should be built along the rivers for flood protection and to improve the channels for navigation.

"9. The public lands should be held as a sacred trust for those who will build homes upon them, and their rapid absorption into private ownership by speculators and to create great ranges for live stock should be immediately stopped.

"10. The National Government should build the great irrigation systems necessary for the reclamation and settlement of the arid region by actual settlers and homemakers, and the lands reclaimed should repay to the Government the cost of the construction of the works.

"GREAT ENGINEERING WORKS.

"The great engineering works necessary for the utilization of the waters of such large rivers as the Columbia, the Missouri, the Colorado, the Snake, the Milk, the Salt and Gila, and the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers in California, should proceed as rapidly as the lands reclaimed will be utilized, and will repay to the Government the cost of the works; and in the great interior central valley of California the problem of the control of the floods of the Sacramento River, which would furnish water enough to irrigate 10,000,000 acres of land, if conserved and utilized, should be treated as a single problem involving arid-land reclamation, flood control, navigation, and drainage, and while the improvements of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers should be continued and extended by the National Government to fully develop the navigability of those rivers, the necessity of coping with the problem in its broadest aspects should be recognized and a complete and comprehensive plan for its entire solution should be prepared without delay by the engineers of the Reclamation Service and of the War Department of the United States."

FORMATION OF LOCAL ORGANIZATIONS.

The urgent needs of different sections of the country for relief along the comprehensive lines embodied in the Newlands river-regulation bill and in the river-regulation amendment, section 18 of the river and harbor act of 1917, have found expression in the formation of strong local organizations in widely separated hydrographic basins. These local organizations have strengthened and supplemented the Nation-wide educational campaign which the National Reclamation Association has during the last 18 years conducted in behalf of this national policy for the conservation, development, and utilization of all the water resources of the Nation for every beneficial purpose for which these now wasted water resources can be utilized, in every practicable way and by every practicable method which can be adopted.

The Pittsburgh Flood Commission was organized by the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce January 30, 1908. It raised a fund of over $125,000, made a complete survey of the watershed of the upper tributaries of the Ohio River above Pittsburgh, and published a report, which covered every phase of the problem of flood control, prevention, and protection with reference to that territory.

This report established indisputably Pittsburgh's need for the broad national river-regulation policy contemplated by the present measure. Out of this need grew the larger and more comprehensive measure designated and known as the Newlands river-regulation bill, which was drawn with the special view of covering the Nation's needs for flood protection as well as waterways. The Newlands river-regulation bill was an extension and enlargement of the original Waterways Commission bills, S. 500 and S. 3717, heretofore referred to in this statement, and was first introduced in the Senate by Senator NEWLANDS on March 1, 1911. It is printed in full on pages 391–396 of the Report of the Pittsburgh Flood Commission, being S. 10900, Sixty-first Congress, third session, and S. 122, Sixty-second Congress, first session.

The Newlands river-regulation bill was indorsed by the National Irrigation Congress at its Chicago session in December, 1911, an indorsement which has been repeatedly reiterated at later sessions of that congress, by the California Inland Waterways Association, by the Legislatures of California, Louisiana, South Dakota, and Wisconsin, and by an almost unanimous public sentiment expressed through the press of practically every State in the Union. A late favorable editorial expression is from the Detroit News, from which is quoted the following excerpt:

"The river and harbor bill contains one provision that may help to solve the 'pork barrel' problem. It provides for a waterways commission of seven members. Congressional rules cut that provision out of the bill in the House, but the Senate restored it. A similar provision was inserted in the bill last year by the Senate, but the bill failed to pass."

After specifying the powers conferred on the commission, this editorial continues:

"These are sweeping powers, but they are needed if system is to be introduced in place of chaos. The country is tired of the annual rivers and harbors bill fight, and will be glad to see the entire control of waterways placed in competent hands. The danger is that Members of Congress eager for appropriations for pet projects ignored by the new board will try to override its reports, as they have sometimes overridden those of the Government's engineers to secure picayune improvements for their districts. But if the country gets behind the commission and insists that its recommendations be adopted, it may be that the annual 'pork barrel' scandal may be avoided hereafter."

NATIONAL RECLAMATION ASSOCIATION.

The most active of the local organizations above referred to was the National Reclamation Association, of Louisiana, organized at New Orleans in January, 1912, and merged with the National Irrigation Association in January, 1913, as the National Reclamation Association. Those associations brought the necessity for source stream control before the Mississippi Valley as a lesson taught by the devastating floods that swept through that valley in 1912 and 1913. The campaign of the National Reclamation Association culminated in resolutions adopted at a great public mass meeting at the Tulane Theater in New Orleans on May 15, 1913. Those resolutions were formally presented to President Wilson by Mr. R. H. Downman, chairman of the National Reclamation Association, acting as the personal representative of Gov. Hall, of Louisiana, on May 18, 1913.

The following is a copy of those resolutions:

FLOOD PROTECTION AND PREVENTION AND RIVER REGULATION.

Resolutions adopted at the second mass meeting of the citizens of New Orleans and Louisiana held at the Tulane Theater on May 15, 1913, reaffirming and reiterating and again approving and indorsing the joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana adopted June 6, 1912, which was specifically and in extenso approved, adopted and indorsed at the first citizens' mass meeting held at the Progressive Union Assembly Hall in New Orleans on June 20, 1912, and indorsing and urging the immediate enactment by Congress of the Newlands river-regulation bill as amended when reported from the Senate Commerce Committee to the Senate on March 3, 1913, and embodied in full in Senate report No. 1339, Sixty-second Congress, third session, the said bill being S. 122, calendar No. 1187, of said session.

[R. H. Downman (chairman), J. H. Fulton, John J. Gannon, Frank B. Hayne, Chas. Janvier, general committee.]

"Whereas the people of the State of Louisiana, through their representatives in legislature assembled, did on June 6, 1912, by joint resolution, concurred in by the senate and house of representatives, declare as follows:

"'Whereas the great flood of 1912 has demonstrated that the National Government only can obviate a recurrence of such overflow disasters in the future by a national policy under which an adequate levee system will be built and maintained as national fortifications against invasion and destruction by the forces of nature; and

"'Whereas the steadily increasing volume of the floods in the lower Mississippi Valley has been largely caused by the changed condition of the watershed in the States comprising the drainage basin of the Ohio, upper Mississippi and Missouri Rivers; and

"'Whereas these causes and conditions are beyond the control of the States bordering the Mississippi from Cairo to the Gulf, and can only be controlled by the National Government: Now, therefore be it

"'Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Louisiana (the Senate concurring therein), That the National Government should immediately extend such temporary relief as may be necessary to repair the broken levees and to maintain them in future, and to control the river in its channel by revetments and bank protective works which will safeguard against the destruction of levees by caving banks and shifting channels.

"'Resolved further, That in working out plans for flood prevention and the protection of the lowlands of the Mississippi Valley from overflow, the Mississippi River and all its tributaries and source streams should be treated as a unit, and a comprehensive and adequate levee system, to be permanently maintained by the National Government, should be supplemented by a system of reservoirs on the headwaters of the Ohio and its tributaries, and also on the upper Mississippi, and by a system of flood-water canals and storage reservoirs in the Missouri River Valley, by means of which the flood plane at Cairo would at all times be so reduced that no combination of high water in the three upper rivers would ever create a great flood in the lower Misisippi Valley, and at the same time prevent overflow and damage by floods in the valleys of the Ohio, the upper Mississippi, and Missouri Rivers.

"'Resolved further, That the Nation can not longer afford to permit its resources of soil, of power, of water, and of navigation, to be carried as a wasteful and destructive flood to the sea, and that since the States themselves can not, in the general interest, prevent this waste, the Federal Government should conserve such floods at their sources, and subject the now wasted waters to beneficial use.'

"And whereas subsequently, on June 20, 1912, at a public mass meeting of the citizens of New Orleans, held in the Progressive Union Assembly Hall, the foregoing joint resolution was approved and ratified and embodied in its entirety in the resolutions adopted at said meeting; and

"Whereas a flood prevention and river regulation conference, attended by representative citizens from many different sections of the State of Louisiana, was held in New Orleans on January 7, 1913, at which resolutions were unanimously adopted urging that the Newlands river-regulation bill should be so amended as to specifically appropriate and set apart $100,000,000 for work on the Mississippi River from St. Louis to the Gulf; and

"Whereas the said bill as originally drawn contained the following provision:

"'SEC. 18. That in carrying out the provisions of this act regard must be had, as far as practicable, to the equitable apportionment and contemporaneous execution of the works and projects contemplated under this act among the several waterways systems of the United States'; and

"Whereas when said bill was reported from the Senate Commerce Committee on March 3, 1913, it was amended in accordance with the resolutions of said flood prevention and river regulation conference and the following provision added to said section 18:

"'Not less than $10,000,000 annually shall be apportioned to the Mississippi River from St. Louis to the Gulf, $5,000,000 to the Missouri River, $5,000,000 to the Ohio River, $5,000,000 to the upper Mississippi River above St. Louis, and $5,000,000 to the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers in California'; and

"Whereas said bill also contains the following specification as to the appropriation and apportionment of the $50,000,000 a year for 10 years appropriated thereby:

"'For the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, for building bank protective works to prevent erosion and cutting of the banks and consequent caving, and to control the river and hold it in a permanently fixed and established channel, and for building and maintaining revetments, dikes, walls, levees, embankments, gates, wasteways, by-passes, flood-water canals, restraining dams, impounding basins, and bank-protective works for river regulation, and as a means to that end the building of works for reclamation, drainage, and flood protection, and for building reservoirs and artificial lakes and basins for the storage of flood waters to prevent and protect against floods and overflows, erosion of river banks, and breaks in levees, and to regulate the flow of source streams and navigable rivers, and reinforce such flow during drought and low-water periods, and for the operation and maintenance of the same, $30,000,000'; and

"Whereas the said Newlands river-regulation bill, when so amended, specifically and by its terms fully and completely provides for New Orleans, La., and the whole Mississippi Valley all the relief and benefits and all the measures for flood protection and prevention, and embodies the entire national policy advocated in the aforesaid joint resolution of the Legislature of Louisiana; and

"Whereas the said bill rejects and condemns no plan, and provides not for 'levees only' or for any one plan to the exclusion of others, but covers and provides for the adoption of all safeguards and all plans and methods for flood protection and prevention that may, after proper survey and examination, be found practicable; and

"Whereas the said bill further provides similar relief and benefits for other sections of the country that are demanding national aid for flood protection, and without whose cooperation and support the Mississippi Valley can not expect to secure such national aid; and

"Whereas the said bill has been before the people of the United States for more than two years, and now has Nation-wide support extending from Pennsylvania to California and from Montana to Texas, and will combine sufficient territorial political strength to insure its passage by Congress;

"Now, therefore, we the citizens of New Orleans and Louisiana, in mass meeting assembled, do most heartily again indorse the wise and patriotic joint resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana on June 6, 1912, and do hereby renew and reiterate the demands embodied in the said joint resolution, and do hereby indorse the Newlands river-regulation bill, and do hereby most earnestly urge the enactment of said bill by Congress at the present session, in order that the development of the Mississippi Valley shall be no longer retarded by the flood menace;

"And we hereby call upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress to extend their hearty and unqualified support to the principles so positively and unequivocally declared, as aforesaid, by the Legislature of Louisiana, and to the aforesaid bill in which those principles have been embodied for congressional enactment."

EDITORIAL FROM NEW ORLEANS ITEM.

After the presentation of the foregoing resolutions to the President at Washington by Mr. Downman on May 18, 1913, the following striking article, setting forth a forecast of what the adoption of the national policy urged in those resolutions would bring to the great territory embraced in the valleys of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, was published editorially in the New Orleans Item of May 23, 1913:

"WHEN THE VALLEY IS REDEEMED AND THE MOSSBACKS ARE ALL FORGOTTEN.

"Let us draw breath a moment in the strife, stop to tighten belts and lean upon our weapons, scan with placid and contented eye the moiling fragments of the scattered, frothing enemy—and then glance beyond the battle lines to the certain victory.

"The space of peace is pardonable. We stand intrenched in truth. The cause is just—God knows none other touches nearer our hearts and homes. The foe is really ignorance, and for the fighters under that banner we can feel pity while we smite them hip and thigh.

"Picture the valley, 10 years hence, with the flood menace long since lifted, with the resource, the purse, and mind and conscience of the great Republic busy completing the task of redeeming and conserving against the waste of future ages the uncounted boundless wealth that fate and nature have given to us here between the Rockies and the Alleghenies.

"In the Appalachians the new forests on the watersheds will have begun to grow anew. On the mountain slopes of upland America the agents of a beneficent Government will have shown the natives how to terrace their hillside farms. In the gorges and valleys of the Allegheny and Monongahela, the Kentucky, the Cumberland, the reservoirs will be finished. On the watersheds of the Ohio to the northward science will have worked out plans to prevent the recurrence of the disaster to come from such floods as 1913. Along the Ohio the locks and dams whose construction has dragged for years will be finished. From out the harbors of Pittsburgh, Louisville, Indianapolis, Cincinnati will be moving vast fleets of barges and modern river craft, bearing to the markets of the South the product of the greatest freight-producing region on this earth—bearing it at the cheapest freight rate the world knows—by the easiest, surest route to the greatest market in the history of mankind.

"Far up the upper Mississippi the canals through to the Great Lakes will be built. Boats will be loading in Minneapolis, in Chicago, in Duluth, Cleveland, Milwaukee, Rock Island, with all the myriad articles their factories and their fields and mines produce that folk to the southward need. Reservoirs above Minneapolis will have lifted danger of flood from a vast area there. From great water-power plants established on the dams, hydroelectric power will keep the busy factories humming through the nights and days—the charge therefor maintaining the works for flood prevention and stream control.

"Away in the far Northwest, on millions of acres of land now lying barren to the suns of summer and the winter winds, the quiet farms will guard their fertile acres—where the water is kept on the 'land that wants it' and off the land that doesn't. From out of the prairies the tide of corn and wheat will move toward the river towns on the Missouri, there by barge to seek the route that nature marked thousands of years ago, down to the southern sea. The Missouri, no longer the sullen, vengeful, reckless stream of disorder and disaster, will carry again the argosies of commerce. On the distant mountain sides the new sapling forests will begin anew to catch and hold the humus and the moisture. Cared for, handled, guarded, controlled, the 'blessed rain,' no longer an agent of destruction everywhere, will be man's best instrument of plenty and prosperity.

"So to the southward may we picture the change—Memphis no longer a promontory in a springtime inland sea, with busied Army officers sending out relief expeditions into the flooded area, but instead a great 'port of call' on the river route to the markets beyond the Gulf and beyond the canal; with warehouses, wharves, elevators, lining its river front; the new-style river steamers replacing the ancient boats of the 'Lee Line' and the old Kate Adams; the harbor busy as that of Hamburg or any city on the Rhine or Elbe; and the whole mind of the people turned away from the dread of disaster to busy thinking of how best to turn to use the tremendous instrument which nature gave and man retained for a Nation's use.

"Imagine the significance of that altered frame of mind on down the valley! Vision the dwellers on the rich lands of the Mississippi Delta, of the Arkansas lowlands, no longer dreading floods! Think of their initiative freed from the numbing weight of the 'flood menace'! Picture the stream flow regulated, levees strong enough to stand the height beyond which the people know the waters can not go and banks assured against all caving! Picture Helena, Arkansas City, Greenville, absolutely safe for themselves and for the region round about them!

"Vision that security in upper Louisiana, in the country facing Vicksburg and Natchez; imagine it in the lowlands along the Red, the Ouachita, the Black! Picture the change in the waste land about the junction of the Red, the Mississippi, and the Atchafalaya, with the swamps reclaimed, with a great controlled sluiceway across Old River, with adequate levees on both sides the Atchafalaya to the Gulf, with locks that will continue navigation while the gated dam controls the stream flow to Red and Mississippi alike!

"In Pointe Coupee and West Baton Rouge, in Iberville and Ascension the current would have ceased to gnaw, the herald of alarm would no longer call the countryside to battle against the water as against a living, vengeful enemy. The banks would be fixed, the levees would be strong and broad and built for the ages.

"At Bayou Plaquemine, at Manchac, at Lafourche, perhaps at other places, there would be regulated, guarded, absolutely controlled spillways, themselves leveed and guarded out to the lakes, to take off the surplus water, insurance against any greater height than the levees would be built to sustain.

"In all the region men would go about their business absolutely sure!

"No longer would the winds of March bring fear and the April rains disaster.

"And in all the valley the new measure of activity, of commerce, of business, would converge toward the valley's outlet to the southward!

"To the empty acres of Louisiana and Mississippi the flocking land-hungry emigrants from the Middle West would have rushed the moment the 'flood menace' had been made sure of extinction. Already the millions of acres of reclaimed and reclaimable land about the mouth of the Mississippi would have been taken up. The swamps would have been cleared and drained, the great estates cut up into busy farms. Good roads, good schools, quickened life and trade already would have remade the life of all. In the towns and villages a new era would have come, a new point of view been opened, a new hope and a new confidence creating a new activity.

"And sitting at the valley's gate, New Orleans, redeemed and safe and whole, would sit the beneficiary of all the change from far-off watersheds in the mountains of the East and West down to the very Gulf. To her merchants would come the trade of the new dwellers on the safe lands of the South. To her banks would center the surplus capital of the region relieved from danger. To her docks and wharves would come the river craft from the Ohio, the Missouri, the Great Lakes, the upper Mississippi, the Red, the Cumberland, the Kentucky, the Tennessee; and to her harbor would assemble the ships of all the seven seas to barter cargoes with the craft from the inland waters.

"A 'dream'?

"'Too good to be true?' in the poetic language of the facile 'Pic.'

"So men sneered at the suggestion that the Great American Desert would ever be smiling farm land. So elder statesmen as wise and weird as RANSDELL laughed to scorn the suggestion that Oregon and Washington were worth fighting for. So the reclamation act was laughed at, and the Appalachian bill said to be a 'joke.' So men scoffed at Edison when he explained his incandescent lamp. So railroad-owned newspapers and their blind followers prodded old John T. Morgan, when through the harassed years he took the part of modern Cato, and ever thundered that 'The canal must be dug?' So learned engineers told Goethals and Roosevelt that the Panama Canal never could be completed in the exact way, shape, and form in which it is being completed!

"So our own fossils of many years ago told Eads the jetties wouldn't work; so our own Supreme Court wisely asserted that no human power could ever filter enough Mississippi River water for New Orleans to drink and bathe in. Yet the jetties are built and working, and the filtered water is at hand for anyone who will turn the faucet!

"A dream?

"No! A plain picture in the large of the exact changes that have been wrought on smaller scale by these exact means in other regions, a picture of what we can get for the Mississippi Valley!

"It is this which the Newlands bill has in view. Mr. RANSDELL has said that the Newlands bill furnishes 'ample means to build levees on the Mississippi and protect us from floods.' His bill proposes no more than that. Isn't the bare possibility that this 'dream' might be made true in its other particulars enough to make it worth working for?"

CALIFORNIA ORGANIZATIONS.

The needs of the San Joaquin Valley and Central California for waterway, flood prevention, and water conservation legislation of this character have been urgently pressed by the Stockton River Regulation Commission, through its chairman, Mr. J. L. Craig, and vice chairman, Mr. G. McM. Ross, and indorsed by the Water Problems Association of California, the Fresno Chamber of Commerce, the San Joaquin Valley Commercial Association, and numerous other similar organizations on the Pacific coast.

The Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce for more than 15 years has been a constant and earnest advocate of this legislation, supported by the Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce and many other similar organizations in every great hydrographic basin in the United States, most active among whom has been the New Orleans Association of Commerce, working in cooperation with the National Reclamation Association, and as the result of their activity, the special requirements and needs of the great Mississippi Valley drainage basin were more fully and specifically provided for in the bill known as the Newlands-Broussard river-regulation bill (S. 2739 and H. R. 12754) printed as Senate Document 418, Sixty-third Congress, second session, which in other respects was substantially the same as the original Newlands river-regulation bill.

On February 24, 1913, the Senate adopted an amendment to the river and harbor bill which was known as the Newlands river-regulation amendment, and which was very similar in its provisions to the amendment embodied in the bill by the Senate Commerce Committee at this session and now under consideration. After extended discussion, however, which will be found in Senate Report 1339, Sixty-second Congress, third session, that amendment was lost in conference.

Again, on May 29, 1916, substantially the same river-regulation amendment was accepted by the Senate as an amendment to the river and harbor bill, but it was afterwards stricken out on a reversed point of order.

When the water-power bill was before the Senate on February 21, 1916, an amendment to that bill was moved by Senator NEWLANDS which embodied the provisions of the Newlands-Broussard river-regulation bill.

The discussion in the Senate at that time on this subject extended over several days, and has been brought together and published as a public document under the title "Water a national asset," copies of which may be had by request addressed to Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, United States Senate, Washington, D. C. That document includes the platforms of the political parties in different campaigns approving the general policy with reference to our rivers which has now taken form in the pending measure. The Democratic platforms of 1908 and 1912 were particularly clear and specific in their pledges for legislation such as that which the Congress is now enacting.

SUPPORT OF PRESIDENT WILSON.

The direct appeal to President Wilson through the resolutions of the mass meeting at New Orleans which were presented to the President by Mr. R. H. Downman on May 18, 1913, resulted later in the appointment by the President of the interdepartmental Cabinet committee, composed of the Secretaries of War, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce, who, with the aid of the chiefs of the different Government services and bureaus having to do with waters and waterways, made a most exhaustive investigation of the subject, particularly with relation to the working out of some plan for the better coordination and cooperation of these Government departments and agencies. As the result of that investigation and study of the subject, the hearty cooperation of the Secretaries named and of President Wilson has been enlisted and exerted in bringing this great public movement to a successful conclusion.

The country is to be congratulated that the support of President Wilson, first expressed in his telegram to Senator NEWLANDS as president of the National Irrigation Congress at its Salt Lake session on September 29, 1912, has resulted in the enactment of the present measure creating the Waterways Commission, which opens up such stupendous possibilities of benefit to the people of the United States.

TELEGRAM FROM WALTER PARKER, OF NEW ORLEANS.

The broad and comprehensive purposes which have actuated the Congress in its enactment, were strongly stated in the report of the Secretaries composing the interdepartmental Cabinet committee to the President on February 26, 1916, set forth in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for April 11, 1916, from which the following is quoted:

[Remarks of Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, of Nevada, in the Senate of the United States, Apr. 11, 1916.]

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, some time ago, at the height of the flood at New Orleans, a telegram was addressed by the New Orleans Association of Commerce to the Secretary of Commerce, which I will insert in the RECORD, calling attention to these floods and to the party assurances given regarding flood mitigation and river development, and suggesting immediate legislative action upon the subject. Following the receipt of that telegram the President reconstituted the interdepartmental committee, which some time ago was instructed by him to inquire into the differing phases of river regulation and control presented by various bodies and to report to him. That committee consisted of the Secretaries of War, of the Interior, of Agriculture, and of Commerce.

"The office of Secretary of War being vacant, the three other Secretaries met and communicated with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], the Representative from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], and myself. Mr. HUMPHREYS was unable to be present, owing to illness; but after several discussions of the question the interdepartmental cabinet committee drew up a report to the President presenting their views regarding needed legislation. That report has been recently transmitted to me by the President of the United States. I ask to have read the letter of the President and the report of the interdepartmental committee, and I will ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the telegram to which I have referred.

"The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

"[Telegram.]

"NEW ORLEANS, February 15, 1916.

"Hon. WILLIAM C. REDFIELD,
"Secretary Department of Commerce, Washington, D. C.

"DEAR SIR: One of the main-line levees of the Mississippi River in northern Louisiana has just given way in a district which suffered in 1912 and in 1913. A vast area of fertile farm land is being inundated. The people are fleeing from their homes. We are sending them help, as we always do. You are one of the members of the interdepartmental committee appointed many months ago to study the various submitted plans of stream and flood control. Your committee, we have been informed, reached an agreement upon the principle of the measures which were to be supported before Congress by the executive department. This organization, voicing the settled judgment of the business community of New Orleans, is on record as favoring the principle and the form of one great measure submitted to you for your approval, and by you in principle indorsed.

"Through three sessions of Congress we have waited patiently for the action to which the Democratic Party is pledged and to which you gentlemen yourselves have submitted your belief and your approval. We have waited, conscious that each year of delay in approaching the problem of flood and stream control in a broad and comprehensive manner adds another year to the many years of our continual and recurring peril. Still no action has come. We do not presume to sit in judgment upon those of you who occupy posts in close relationship to the processes of legislation and of executon in the Federal Government, but we do know that our peril continues, that we lose in money and in lives in each returning year of flood. We suffer an invasion as real as though it were directed by the head of an alien government. We lose lives as certainly as though they had been lost in Mexico or on the high seas. We suffer the imposition of indemnities which we must meet with taxes and bond issues that are just as much indemnities as though levied by a conquering army, and through the years and in proportion to the wealth of the region afflicted, what we have lost and what we have paid surpasses the indemnities inflicted upon France after the Franco-Prussian War—the greatest indemnity ever paid by any one nation.

"Here in New Orleans we feel that we as individuals and our investments are physically safe because we have massed resources of human power and of material which enable us to keep our levee breastworks so far ahead of the long lines reaching up the two sides of the Mississippi River from here to Cape Girardeau that levees elsewhere give way before the flood level reaches us, and thus we are saved by the misfortune of our fellow citizens of the Mississippi Valley. We appeal to you now in behalf of those unfortunates in Kentucky, southern Missouri, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana who have lost their homes, their fortunes, or their lives through the onslaught of the forces of nature operating over the territory of thirty-odd States, and concentrating their evil effect upon those who live in the smaller regions on the lower reaches of the Mississippi Valley.

"It is now too late for Congress to do more for those who are suffering than to give them food, if they need it, to furnish them with Government tents, and to put at their call the officers of the United States Army; but it is not too late for the interdepartmental committee to make known its conclusion and its findings with reference to suggested legislation having to do with the inland rivers of the United States. It is not too late for the executive department of the Government to put its recommendations before Congress, to lend the strength of its influence in support of the measures already drafted and pending therein, which will bring to bear upon the whole vast interrelated problem of stream flow control, flood disaster prevention, and use of the rivers in navigation the coordinated power and capacity of the whole Federal Government. It is not too late for this administration and this Congress to undertake 'after Panama' the task of 'the inland rivers'; carrying out the policy so well phrased and indorsed by President Wilson in his telegraphic message to Senator NEWLANDS, dispatched in the autumn of 1912:

"'SEAGIRT, N. J., September 29, 1912.

"'Hon. FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
"'President Irrigation Congress, Salt Lake, Utah:

"'Please express to the National Irrigation Congress my hearty approval of the policy it is met to promote, and especially of the policy of supplementing bank and levee protection by storage of flood waters above for irrigation and water power, turning floods from a menace into a blessing and at the same time abundantly feeding navigable waters.

"'WOODROW WILSON.'

"Is it asking too much to request you to read this telegram at the next Cabinet meeting as a respectful and an urgent message from the Association of Commerce, as representing the afflicted and jeopardized people, to the responsible heads of a Government from which we had expected adequate measures of safety?

"WALTER PARKER,
"General Manager New Orleans Association of Commerce."

REPORT OF THE INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. Now I ask that the Secretary read the letter of the President and the report of the interdepartmental committee.

"The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

"The Secretary read as follows:

"THE WHITE HOUSE,
"Washington, April 3, 1916.

"Hon FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
"United States Senate.

"MY DEAR SENATOR: I take the liberty of sending you inclosed a copy of a memorandum concerning flood control which the Secretaries of the Interior, of Agriculture, and of Commerce were kind enough to prepare for me. I hope that it will prove of interest to you. I know that you were consulted at the time the memorandum was contemplated.

"Sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

"THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
"Washington, February 26, 1916.

"DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In accordance with your suggestion, we beg to present a résumé of our views as to the practicable way of dealing with the problem of so regulating and handling our rivers that they will be made to be of greater use and of less injury to the Nation.

"We do not feel the necessity for emphasizing the need for such legislation. Each recurring year makes plain the greatness of the work that must be undertaken if we are to keep our rivers within their banks. The floods of each year take their toll in property and lives. Our streams are filling with silt and their channels becoming less certain and reliable as nature's primal highways. Vast bodies of lands of the richest alluvial character are submerged so large a portion of the time as to be of no value to the Nation and of no service to the world. Therefore, to make more navigable our streams, to protect the cities and farms already established and to make a place for others, to save life and increase our crops, to conserve the waters on the higher reaches of the streams where they may be used for needed irrigation, and to convert their fall into electric power—these are the chief ends to be reached by river improvement.

"It is now time, we believe, to urge a comprehensive and constructive plan of river development upon Congress, a plan which recognizes the magnitude of the problem, the impossibility of dealing with it by temporary expedients, and that looks definitely to the time when the flood evils of to-day will be remedied and the waters put to their highest use. This means nothing less than a study under one responsible authority of the problems and possibilities of each river, and after such study a determination upon a definite policy with regard to it and the commitment of the Government to the pursuit of such policy. It has been suggested that an adequate lump-sum and continuing fund for carrying on such national work shall be placed in the hands of a commission composed of the President and four of his Cabinet, which fund shall be expended upon such projects as it sees fit. We do not think this plan in its logical entirety necessary to the end in view.

"We do believe, however, that the Congress should commit itself to a comprehensive policy of river development, involving the expenditure over a long period of a large sum of money, with sufficient appropriations immediately available for continuing the work on the lower Mississippi substantially in accordance with the plans of the Mississippi River Commission, and for taking the necessary preliminary steps for the study of problems and the projection of work on other parts of the Mississippi and of other rivers. It should study each river system, and as projects are developed reports with recommendations for expenditure should be made to Congress, with the understanding that Congress, on the basis of the data furnished, would provide sufficient sums for the continuous prosecution of the work. There are precedents for this course, such as the Panama Canal and the Alaskan railroad projects. In these cases Congress determined that such enterprise should be undertaken, the general lines of development, and in a sense pledged itself to award the money necessary for the completion of the enterprise within a limited time, leaving the details of the plans and their execution to executive bodies.

"We believe that for the execution of such a policy the Congress should authorize a national waterways council, composed of the President and the four heads of departments most concerned—War, Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce—and a subordinate water-control board, composed of a highly qualified representative from each of the four departments and of such engineers or other officials as the Congress may authorize. The four department representatives of the latter board should have such standing in the departments and such functions as would enable them to secure such data and services in connection with the work from the various bureaus in the departments as may be serviceable and necessary. The national waterways council should be authorized to direct and control the general policy and procedure of the water-control board and other agencies charged with the execution of the work, to establish the necessary rules and regulations, to consider and approve plans, the distribution of funds under authorization from the Congress, to decide questions of conflict, and to report to Congress. The latter board should be authorized to coordinate and invoke the services of the necessary bureaus and agencies of the Government, to make preliminary surveys and detailed plans for work in various areas, to prepare estimates, to study the activities of the States, municipalities, organizations, and individuals in water regulation, to prepare a general program of water and waterways regulation and development involving the combined resources and cooperation of all the agencies, to recommend to the council for approval the assignments for the different bureaus or services of the departments, to complete statements of the work already accomplished, and immediately to supervise the prosecution of the work under the plans approved. It would be understood that in the meantime there should be no interference with the execution of the existing plans of the Mississippi River Commission for the work on the lower Mississippi, and that these plans should proceed as outlined unless it should become clear that improvements could be made.

"The most pressing call for help has come and continues to come from the lower Mississippi. As to this river what may be determined defensive plans have been elaborated by the eminent body of national officials who are now prepared to proceed with their work to its completion. Their embarrassment arose out of the fact that they can not plan for the execution of their work continuously and for a sufficiently long period, owing to the fact that each year the work must wait on the appropriations for that year. There would seem to be every reason for prosecuting these plans vigorously, and later as investigations proceed for supplementing these works with others of a constructive nature higher up the river, and for undertaking as soon as possible projects on other rivers.

"To summarize, we recommend:

"1. That Congress declare its purpose to deal with our river problems in a comprehensive way, involving a large ultimate expenditure of funds and the immediate expenditure of considerable amounts, and the creation of machinery intimately related to the executive branch of the Government.

"2. That the boards and the other parts of the machinery provided for shall be directed to continue the work on the lower Mississippi substantially under existing plans, and to proceed with the investigations and the elaboration of plans on other parts of the Mississippi River and other rivers of the Nation.

"3. That all the available agencies of the Government shall be coordinated in this endeavor to improve and protect our rivers, to control floods, to utilize waters, and to reclaim valuable lands and make the necessary reports to Congress as bases for additional appropriations.

"4. That the expenditures for this work should, in the main, be met by the sale of national bonds, and that the lands benefited should be made to bear a proportion of such expenses, agreements in this regard to be submitted to the Congress as part of the plan for development.

"Cordially, yours,

"FRANKLIN K. LANE.
"D. F. HOUSTON.
"WILLIAM C. REDFIELD.

"The PRESIDENT,
"The White House."

The necessity for such legislation as that embodied in the river-regulation amendment, section 18 of the river and harbor bill of 1917, was explained in brief and its relation to the provisions of the Democratic platforms of 1908 and 1912 shown in the remarks of Senator NEWLANDS in the Senate on February 21, 1916, on the subject, as set forth in the following quotation from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date:

"RIVER DEVELOPMENT FOR INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

"Mr. KENYON. May I suggest that in the debate on the river and harbor bill it was disclosed that over $140,000,000 had been spent on the Mississippi River.

"Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. Can the Senator give us any good reason, any substantial reason, that would tend to clarify our minds and vision, when we come to the consideration of this subject, as to how it is that after having spent $140,000,000 on the Mississippi River there is not any commerce on that river?

"Mr. NEWLANDS. I tried to explain that in my remarks when the Senator from New Hampshire was not present.

"Mr. GALLINGER. I am sorry I was not present.

"Mr. NEWLANDS. But I shall be glad to give the Senator an epitome of what I said on that subject.

"THE MISSISSIPPI AS A PERFECTED INSTRUMENTALITY OF COMMERCE.

"The Senator's inquiry is as to how, logically, we can consider the expenditure of more money on the Mississippi River when the expenditure of $140,000,000 has done very little toward the promotion of navigation on that river. My answer is that that expenditure has been scattered most ineffectively over a great number of years; that the expenditure did not involve the comprehensive treatment of the entire river with a view to making it an instrumentality of commerce; that the work was done largely in detached places here and there, in the removal of sand bars and other obstructions or in the construction of levees, and so forth; but that there never has been an effort really to artificialize and perfect the Mississippi River as an instrumentality of commerce. That involves the establishment of transfer facilities and sites, the dovetailing of the river with the rails by a system of legislation and administration, the construction of the proper wharves, the erection of the proper stations and warehouses, and so forth. The river has thus far been developed practically as a railroad would be developed across the continent, with spaces, every mile or two, of rails left out, or without stations or sidetracks. The Senator can understand how effective a railroad would be upon which a very considerable amount of money had been expended that was in that condition; and that has been practically the condition of the Mississippi River.

* * * * * * *

"What does the development of our rivers for purposes of commerce mean? It means the construction of wharves, warehouses, and transfer facilities, the acquisition of transfer sites, and a complete coordination with our railways. We have allowed our railways to sandbag our water carriers without protecting our water carriers by the law, and then we have failed to give our water carriers a perfected instrumentality, which means not only a steady channel, a steady flow of water, but wharves, warehouses, and transfer facilities and a coordination of rail and water carriage.

"You might as well say that you could perfect railway transportation by building a railway across the continent, leaving out the rails every 10 miles and leaving out sidetracks, warehouses, and stations, as to contend that you can make a river an instrumentality of commerce under the conditions which have prevailed with reference to their development.

"How have the water carriers been enabled to sustain themselves in this unequal conflict? Sandbagged by the railways during the period of navigability that put down their rates to the point of loss, without terminal facilities, without transfer facilities, without stations or warehouses, unprotected by the law, the individual carrier, the owner of a steamboat, has been compelled to struggle against these tremendous odds, and because he has not succeeded the former Senator from Ohio, after years of investigation, practically declares that the improvement of our rivers for purposes of commerce is a failure.

"Would the Germans have succeeded under such a system? Did they allow the railroads to sandbag the water carriers? Did they say, 'We will perfect railways in every way with single and double tracks and sidetracks and stations and warehouses and the most perfect facilities for transportation, and all we will do on our rivers is to dredge a sand bar here and there, or here and there put up some levees for the protection of some swampland proprietor?' Did they content themselves with that, perfecting the railway system and allowing the river system to take care of itself?

"No; they practically artificialized every river throughout its entire course and the tributaries, and not only that but they connected them by canals entirely artificial in their creation, and to-day waterway transportation is just as important as railway transportation, and it is important because it is the cheapest known method of transportation, for you can carry enormous bulk in barges and steamers. In a single barge itself you can carry as much as can be carried in an entire train. The cheapness of carriage to-day from Pittsburgh down to New Orleans of coal and iron indicates how cheap that transportation is.

"DEMORCATIC PLEDGES.

"Now, Mr. President, the Democratic Party is under a peculiar obligation to do something upon this great subject, for whilst the Republican Party for years has been contenting itself with general phrases the Democratic Party in two conventions has declared in the most specific terms, first, for the coordination of all the scientific services of the Government that relate to water so that their plans shall dovetail with each other; second, for the cooperation of the Nation with the State so that each can cooperate with the other in the formation of plans and the construction of works belonging to their respective jurisdictions; and, third, the creation of an ample fund for continuous work covering every watershed in the country.

"I will ask to insert these various planks of the platform of 1908 and the platform of 1912 in the RECORD.

"The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

"The matter referred to is as follows:

"WATERWAYS.

"Water furnishes the cheaper means of transportation, and the National Government, having the control of navigable waters, should improve them to their fullest capacity. We earnestly favor the immediate adoption of a liberal and comprehensive plan for improving every water course in the Union which is justified by the needs of commerce; and to secure that end we favor, when practicable, the connection of the Great Lakes with the navigable rivers and with the Gulf through the Mississippi River and the navigable rivers with each other by artificial canals, with a view of perfecting a system of inland waterways to be navigated by vessels of standard draft.

"We favor the coordination of the various services of the Government connected with waterways in one service for the purpose of aiding in the completion of such a system of inland waterways, and we favor the creation of a fund ample for continuous work, which shall be conducted under the direction of a commission of experts to be authorized by law.

"DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM, 1912.

"WATERWAYS.

"We renew the declaration in our last platform relating to the conservation of our natural resources and the development of our waterways. The present devastation of the lower Mississippi Valley accentuates the movement for the regulation of river flow by additional bank and levee protection below and the diversion, storage, and control of the flood waters above, and the utilization for the beneficial purposes in the reclamation of arid and swamp lands and the development of water power instead of permitting the floods to continue, as heretofore, agents of destruction.

"We hold that the control of the Mississippi River is a national problem. The preservation of the depth of its water for the purposes of navigation, the building of levees to maintain the integrity of its channel, and the prevention of the overflow of the land and its consequent devastation, resulting in the interruption of interstate commerce, the disorganization of the mail service, and the enormous loss of life and property, impose an obligation which alone can be discharged by the General Government.

"To maintain an adequate depth of water the entire year, and thereby encourage water transportation, is a consummation worthy of legislative attention and presents an issue national in its character. It calls for prompt action on the part of Congress, and the Democratic Party pledges itself to the enactment of legislation leading to that end.

"We favor the cooperation of the United States and the respective States in plans for the comprehensive treatment of all waterways with a cooperative plan for channel improvement, with plans for drainage of swamp and overflowed lands, and to this end we favor the appropriation by the Federal Government of sufficient funds to make surveys of such lands, to develop plans for drainage of the same, and to supervise the work of construction.

"We favor the adoption of a liberal and comprehensive plan for the development and improvement of our inland waterways with economy and efficiency, so as to permit their navigation by vessels of standard draft."

EXTRACTS FROM THE PRESS.

The broad and comprehensive plan for dealing with the problems of river improvement for navigation and the conservation, development, and utilization of all the water resources of the United States embodied in the river-regulation amendment has been widely discussed in the press of the country from one end of it to the other, and has received the practically unanimous approval of the best thought of the Nation, as expressed through resolutions of organizations of every character and the leading newspapers.

The following quotations are merely a brief indication of the trend of sentiment shown by and expressed in thousands of similar indorsements:

"Senator NEWLANDS certainly deserves well of his country for pushing his waterways proposition as he has done." (Salt Lake Tribune.)

"Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, of Nevada, has been talking sound sense about the futility of the present method of making appropriations for rivers and harbors." (New York Tribune.)

"The Mississippi Valley's prosperity is essential to the prosperity of the whole country; the only way to secure its prosperity is by flood prevention; the only effective flood prevention is by the passage of the Newlands bill or similar legislation." (Houston (Tex.) Chronicle.)

"In the face of the awful lessons of 1911, 1912, and 1913, those Congressmen who opposed the Newlands bill in the last session assumed a grave responsibility." (Los Angeles Tribune.)

"The appalling flood catastrophe which has just befallen the people of the Ohio River Valley emphasizes with striking and irresistible force the urgent and imperative necessity of the national legislation embodied in the Newlands river-regulation bill." (Cincinnati (Ohio) Commercial Tribune.)

"Probably no man in public life is better fitted to discuss questions relating to conservation, particularly as regards dealing with water, than United States Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, of Nevada." (Troy (N. Y.) Times.)

"Senator NEWLANDS's bill seems to be broadly national, rather than selfishly sectional, and in that is to be found no small part of its wisdom and the promise of its deserved success before Congress." (Los Angeles Examiner.)

"We join heartily with Senator NEWLANDS in his idea that the time has come when the issue should be made between annual expenditure of millions on fighting the Mississippi River and a sensible attempt to control it to the advantage of unirrigated territory. The issue is simply one between loss and gain." (Minneapolis News.)

"Senator NEWLANDS is not only a broad-minded statesman and an able speaker, he is an adroit manager and he combines the suaviter in modo with the fortiter in re. When Congress emerges from the tariff-currency-Mexican web in which all other legislation is now enmeshed it may, and probably will, take up the Newlands reclamation bill. Once it shall be seriously considered its passage will be a foregone conclusion." (Los Angeles Times.)

"The Newlands bill for the regulation of water flow in the Mississippi Valley and for the reclamation of waste lands is in every feature thoroughly practicable." (F. H. Newell, Director of the Reclamation Service, quoted in the New Orleans Item.)

"The remedy for a pork-barrel system lies in a comprehensive national plan for river improvement and flood prevention, which shall treat each stream in the country as a unit, which shall utilize all the departments of the Federal Government in cooperation, and which shall have regard for all the uses of water, instead of regarding only the local interest. Such a plan is before Congress now in the form of the Newlands river-regulation bill. * * * The adoption of this plan for river control and use would result in the absorption and retention of the water on the upper source streams and tributaries, and this would so standardize the flow and lower the ordinary flood levels and raise the low-water levels that navigation would be enormously improved.

"But the occupation of levee boards, contractors, Army engineers, local politicians, and others who profit from the piecemeal, mud-pie system of sinking money in useless river projects would be gone. Therefore the Newlands bill sleeps in committee, while the pork barrel rolls merrily forward." (Gilson Gardner in Harper's Weekly.)

"The measure proposed is not the result of any slight consideration of the big work in hand, but its terms embody the best thought in the Nation on the subject of river regulation and control, and it behooves everybody in the two great valleys of the State to get behind the bill and leave nothing undone to impress Congress with the crying necessity for such a measure." (Stockton (Cal.) Independent.)

"The Newlands bill, now before Congress, proposes a new policy of flood prevention and river regulation, a policy that clearly recognizes the vital necessity of conserving the food supply of the Nation, which supply is absolutely dependent upon water." (St. Paul Pioneer Press.)

"It is with extreme satisfaction that we note the fast-growing popularity and progress of the Newlands river-regulation bill." (Stockton (Cal.) Mail.)

"This is the greatest constructive measure ever inaugurated by the United States Government for the protection of those affected by the wet and dry seasons of our rivers." (Escalon (Cal.) Tribune.)

"According to Judson C. Wall, of New York, a conservation specialist who advocates the Newlands bill, a comprehensive measure for conserving soil fertility, this country is losing under the present river-regulating policy an average of over $100,000,000 a year." (Wall Street (N. Y.) Journal.)

"A comprehensive, practical, and efficient measure is the Newlands bill for the control of floods of this great valley, and it is growing more and more in public favor as it is better understood." (Memphis News-Scimitar.)

"It is interesting to note that the Newlands bill is gaining friends and that there seems to be good grounds for expecting its passage." (Dayton (Ohio) News.)

"All California, without regard for political considerations or affiliations, will get behind Senator NEWLANDS's comprehensive plan for the development of the inland waterways of the State. Senator NEWLANDS proposes to meet in a statesmanlike way, by a single operation, three of the most pressing problems that confront the people of California." (San Francisco News Letter.)

"The Newlands plan offers opportunities for realization of the ambitions which the people of this region have long cherished and deserves the support of all progressive citizens." (Portland (Oreg.) Oregonian.)

"There can be little doubt that one of the greatest physical tasks awaiting the people of the United States is the proper development of the national water supply. Nor can there be any doubt that this development will best be achieved by a nationally directed policy rather than by the haphazard methods of the different States and of irresponsible private enterprise." (San Francisco Bulletin.)

"Senator NEWLANDS will deserve the thanks of the Nation if he can devise a method of removing the taint of 'pork barrel' from the rivers and harbors bills."

EDITORIAL FROM SAN FRANCISCO CALL-POST.

The following is a reproduction of an editorial from the San Francisco Call-Post of August 28, 1917, which points out the great benefits that may result from the inauguration of the policy embodied in the river-regulation amendment, with reference to the industrial conditions that will prevail after the close of the war with Germany:

WORK FOR CALIFORNIA AFTER WAR—TO SAVE WASTED WATER—RESOURCES WORTH $15,000,000,000 WAIT UTILIZATION WHILE VAST AREA OF LAND REMAINS UNPRODUCTIVE.

"After the war, what?

"When the world has been made safe for democracy; when 20,000,000 men have stacked their guns; when the colossal war machine has been brought to a dead halt and the engines and industries of destruction are at last standing still, where shall this inconceivable energy which is now devastating the world be diverted?

"For California this question was raised and answered a few days ago in the United States Senate by Senator FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS.

"No Californian knows better than Senator NEWLANDS what are California's greatest resources and needs.

"On August 2 Congress adopted his amendment to the rivers and harbors bill. It is a measure whereby the United States Government will undertake the solution of the Nation's water problems. Senator NEWLANDS had won a victory for which he has been fighting for 10 years. He said:

"Peace will bring far-reaching stagnation unless some great constructive policy for building internal improvements is substituted for the stimulus to industry created by the war that will be withdrawn when peace returns.

"The instant peace has been achieved this Nation can turn the same indomitable energy that it is now devoted to winning the war against a foreign foe to winning a greater war against the destroying forces of nature.

"The greatest waste that takes place in the country to-day is the waste of its surplus waters, which are the Nation's greatest asset, but which now run to waste in the sea, carrying destruction in their path in the form of devastating floods. We must learn to conserve that waste and fight that devastation with exactly the same vast and all-conquering energy that we are now devoting to war.

"What is that waste in California? What is the value of our undeveloped water resources?

"When HIRAM W. JOHNSON, now with NEWLANDS in the Senate, was governor of California he appointed Dr. George C. Pardee, former governor, head of a conservation commission to study this question and make investigations.

"Pardee devoted several years to the work.

"He computes the value of California's water resources at $15,000,000,000.

"Fifteen billions of dollars!

"Fifteen thousand times one million!

"Such a sum is inconceivable, as Senator JOHNSON said only the other day in Washington. The human mind can not grasp it. Like infinitude, it is incomprehensible.

"Were this wealth in minted money or in some form that we could measure and divide, it would mean, if distributed, $5,000 to every man, woman, and child in California to-day.

"Enough that every family, counting five to a family, could have a $25,000 farm.

"And since this wealth consists entirely of the unused water and the unused land in the State—though Dr. Pardee did not include the value of the land in his estimate—the farm, of course, makes the most appropriate unit of measurement.

"Dr. Pardee estimates that the water of the State for power purposes is worth $10,000,000,000 and for irrigation $5,000,000,000.

"Less than one-tenth of the available water power is now harnessed, and less than one-fifth of the irrigable lands are being watered.

"To make the $15,000,000,000 available for man's enjoyment is the work that Senator NEWLANDS refers to.

"To harness these waste waters, to irrigate another 12,000,000 acres of arid lands, is the work that confronts California.

"To reach this treasure will require the building of great dams, of reservoirs, power plants, and irrigation works.

"There is the fight for California when the war is done."

War Revenue.

OF

HON. HORACE M. TOWNER,

OF IOWA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, October 1, 1917.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, it is worthy of notice that in the consideration of this measure there has been nothing of party politics. In the past, at least for more than half a century, the principal ground of contention between the dominant parties has been how best to raise money necessary to carry on the Government. The tariff has been always under discussion. Party lines have been closely drawn on these issues. Now party lines are obliterated. The lines of division on the various items contained in this greatest of all revenue bills have crossed from side to side without regard to party affiliations.

A general increase of all tariff rates was proposed by a Democratic committee. But Republicans were not urgent in its support. There were doubts as to the wisdom of a horizontal raise on all imports, and a general agreement that it was impossible at this time to satisfactorily revise the tariff. So the proposition was allowed to die without much protest.

If party lines can not be drawn even on the tariff it is evident that there is general agreement that the raising of revenue to support the Government to carry on the war is not and must not be made a party issue.

TAXES AND BONDS.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, we are compelled to raise about $21,000,000,000, a sum so enormous that it is beyond precedent or comprehension. No nation has ever even considered raising such a sum within one year. No other nation could from its own resources raise such an amount. We must take all of it from our own accumulations and resources. It is admitted that there are only two sources from which we can draw, taxes and bonds. The first question which ought to be determined is what policy should we adopt as to the relative proportion between these two means of securing money to carry on the Government.

Every one will admit there is a limit beyond which we ought not to go in current taxation. Manifestly we can not obtain the entire amount required, $21,000,000,000, by taxation. Still it should be evident we ought to obtain all that we can by taxation without crippling industry, discouraging production, or impairing capital. All else required we must obtain by bond issues. Conditions naturally differ among nations, so that each must determine for itself its policy. Nevertheless valuable lessons may be learned from other countries which for years have actually engaged in the war.

Excise	83,950,000
Legacies and succession	19,365,000
Income taxes	788,920,000
Excess profits and munitions	699,600,000
Total increases	1,767,390,000

It will be observed that of the total increases made, to wit, $1,767,390,000, $1,488,520,000 were the increases on the two items of income taxes and excess profits and munitions taxes. Eighty-six per cent of all increases were obtained from these two items. The rate of taxation in Great Britain on war profits over normal peace profits during this last year was 80 per cent. We have thus available a good example of what the effect of such increases upon industry and trade is. The reports are unanimous that it has had no damaging effect whatever, that business was never so good, and that it has continued to grow better year by year during the war period, and especially during the later months under the higher rates.

It would appear clear from this experiment in war taxation that increases in the rates of taxation on incomes and a heavy tax on war profits is perfectly safe from an economical point of view. Certainly it is justifiable to make such increases from the standpoint of justice. If normal profits are allowed and only a percentage of war profits are taken there would appear no injustice. The maker would still be allowed a portion of the profits growing out of the war. He ought not to complain if a part be taken to help carry on the war.

If the receiver of vast incomes, much more than is needed or can be used, is required to make relinquishment of a part to help sustain and preserve the Government, he is doing no more than is fair. The Government requires the relinquishment of liberty and even life itself to save the Nation. The payment of large portions of excessive incomes is justifiable both on economical and moral grounds in time of war.

INCREASES ON LARGE INCOMES AND WAR PROFITS TAXES.

In the legislation so far enacted we have appropriated and authorized a total sum of $21,370,000,000.

Our revenues provided will secure by taxation about $4,193,000,000. Our bond issues will total $17,001,000,000.

Our total resources to meet our total expenditures will be $21,194,000,000 if our bond issues are all floated.

But it is agreed that additional appropriations will be required between now and June 30, 1918, variously estimated at from $2,000,000,000 to $4,000,000,000. To meet these no provision has been made. No one claims that a greater amount of bonds than is now authorized can be floated during that period. Provisions ought to have been made in this bill for a larger amount of taxation, and this additional amount should have been secured by higher rates on large incomes and on excess or war profits. Efforts were made, both in the House and Senate, to increase these rates. It would have been possible to have increased them so as to produce the $2,000,000,000 or even $4,000,000,000 that will be needed without reaching proportionally the rates of increases now prevailing in Great Britain. It should have been done now, for war profits pass with the war, and every month that these excessive profits are allowed to pass into individual ownership decreases the available source of such taxation.

If the bond issues are slow in floating, or if large additional appropriations are required, additional taxation will be required, perhaps under conditions not so favorable as now prevail.

Other reasons exist why these increases should have been made. Many of the items of taxation contained in this bill are consumptive taxes and bear most heavily on the poorer classes of our people. Such taxes might well have been omitted. It is not wise to place burdens on those who are least able to bear them and to exempt those who can most easily carry them. Nothing would so popularize the war as the realization by our people that burdens are as far as possible being equalized, and that every one is doing his share.

NATIONAL RESOURCES.

Tremendous as is the financial burden of the war, there is no doubt but we shall be able to carry it. In wealth and resources we are far richer than any other nation.

The national wealth of Great Britain at the beginning of the war was estimated at $90,000,000,000. Of France, $65,000,000,000. Germany, $80,000,000,000. Our own wealth at that time was estimated at $160,000,000,000. It is now in excess of $200,000,000,000.

The national debt of France at the beginning of the war was $6,346,000,000. Of Germany, $5,048,000,000. Of Great Britain, $3,443,000,000. Our own debt was but $1,103,000,000.

We have within our command every material resource necessary to carry on a war. Best of all, we have a patriotic and capable citizenship. Our man power will be strong because our people are patriotic, are intelligent, and are exceptionally capable. We shall triumph because our cause is just, because our people love their country, because we shall put in the field the best soldiers in the world, and because we have the resources to maintain both our Army and our Navy on a scale of efficiency not possible to any other nation.

SUPPORT OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

There is general support of this bill for the reason that it is necessary that legislation to secure the required revenue to carry on the war be passed. Because Members of the House vote for the bill does not imply that they favor or approve its every provision. I presume there is not a Member who would not change some of the provisions of the bill if he could frame it as he would wish. But all, or practically all, of us desire first of all the fullest measure of support possible to the Administration in carrying on the war. Protest and opposition, even when based on honest conviction, if carried too far result in serious harm. To present determined opposition to the Administration which is charged with the duty of carrying on the war creates the impression on the world of want of support by our people of the war. That is to lend aid and comfort to the enemy. That is to prolong the war. That is to increase the destruction of life and burdens of taxation. Men who really love their country can subordinate individual opinion unless it shall contribute to strengthen the Government. He will best look back with pride on his record during these trying years who can find in it no obstruction, no hindrance, no injury to the great task that is ours of supporting our sons whom we are sending across the seas to fight in a great war in response to their country's call.
